PREFACE TO WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY.

§ 1. ALTHOUGH universal suffrage¹ has assigned the highest rank amongst the English Historians to William of Malmesbury, yet there are few of our writers concerning whose personal history we have such scanty information. The particulars respecting him which have descended to our times, are, for the most part, gleaned from his own writings, and these notices are fragmentary and unimportant. We learn, indeed, from himself, that one of his parents was of Norman² descent, the other of English; but as to their names, residence, and position in society, we know nothing. We are equally ignorant as to the time and place of his birth; but if we may venture to adopt a statement advanced by some biographers,³ we shall rank him among the natives of the county of Somerset. The love of knowledge which was so conspicuous in his later years, exhibited itself at an early period of his life, and he has preserved an account⁴ of the occupations and the studies of his boyhood in a passage of sufficient importance to be inserted entire.

§ 2. "A long period has elapsed since, as well through the care of my parents as by my own industry, I became familiar with books. This pleasure possessed me from my childhood; this source of delight has grown with my years; indeed, I was so instructed by my father, that had I turned aside from these to other pursuits, I should have considered it as jeopardy to my soul, and discredit to my character. Mindful, therefore, of the adage, 'Covet what is necessary,' I constrained my early age to desire eagerly that which it was disgraceful not to desire. I gave, indeed, my attention to various branches of literature, but in different degrees. Logic, for instance, which gives arms to eloquence, I contented myself with barely hearing; medicine, which ministers to the health of the body, I studied with somewhat more of attention; but having scrupulously examined the several branches of ethics, I bow down to its majesty, because it spontaneously unveils itself to those who study it, and directs their minds to moral practice; history more especially, which, by a certain agreeable recapitulation of past events, excites its readers, by example, to frame their lives to the pursuit of good, or to aversion from evil. When, therefore, at my own personal expense, I had procured some historians of foreign nations, I proceeded, during my domestic leisure, to inquire if anything concerning our own country could be found worthy of handing down to posterity. Hence it arose that, not content with the writings of ancient times, I began myself to compose; not, indeed, in order to display my learning, which is comparatively nothing, but to bring to light events lying concealed in the confused mass of antiquity. In consequence, rejecting vague opinions, I have studiously sought for chronicles, far and near, though I confess I have scarcely profited anything by this industry; for, perusing them all, I still remain poor in information, though I carried out my researches as long as I could find anything to read."

² See Preface to Book III. p. 217, and another passage to the same effect, p. 216.

§ 3. The period to which this extract relates,—the period of anarchy which followed upon the Norman invasion, was one which made the seclusion of a cloister the only safe refuge for a youth of such a disposition as that described above: and we need feel no surprise at discovering the future historian of England an inmate of the Benedictine establishment of Malmesbury. Here, while he devoted himself to the discharge of his more immediate duties, he found leisure for the prosecution of his self-imposed studies. These were directed partly to theology, but chiefly to history, general, local, and biographical; and the list of his writings preserved by Tanner, Cave, and others, evinces the zeal and the industry of his pen.¹

§ 4. Of these, the most important is the narrative contained in the present volume, which may be divided into two portions,—“The History of the Kings of England,” and its continuation, “The History of his Own Times.” The second of these was probably one of the latest works upon which Malmesbury was employed, and he appears to have occupied himself in revising, correcting, and improving it as long as he lived. The former division, “The History of the Kings of England,” embraces a chronicle from the earliest period of our authentic history, (for the critical bias of his mind induced Malmesbury to reject the British traditions,) to the year one thousand one hundred and twenty, shortly after which date it appears to have been finished. So far, however, from regarding the work as perfect, he requests¹ that such of his readers as possessed information with which he was unacquainted, would communicate their knowledge to him while he was yet alive, in order that such events might appear at least in the margin of his history, as did not occur in the body of the text itself. This appeal seems to have led to numerous alterations, some few of which are important, while the greater number merely affect the style, in the polishing of which Malmesbury has proved himself exceedingly solicitous.

§ 5. The "Historia Novella," or as I have ventured to paraphrase the title, "The History of his Own Times," embraces that period of English history which intervened between the death of Henry the First (A. D. 1135) and the year one thousand one hundred and forty-two. It ends in a manner somewhat abrupt, which leads to the inference that it does not fully represent the latest intentions of the author, and that a more extended narrative was in contemplation, if not in active progress, when his labours were interrupted by death;² and at the same time the variations which occur in the different copies—variations which have evidently proceeded from the hand of the author³—prove that upon this portion of his work, also, Malmesbury's busy pen was employed, until the latest moment, in minute alterations and corrections.

§ 6. Malmesbury was sufficiently well acquainted with the remains of classical antiquity to understand the distinction between a chronicle and a history;⁴ and he aimed at the production of a work which should be honoured with the latter designation. This ambition has been attended with results which we cannot but regret, for it has induced him to pass by, as trivial and undignified, many circumstances, to us of exceeding value, and with which he must have been acquainted; circumstances which probably would have found a place in the pages of the less aspiring chronicler. More than this, his proposed imitation of classical antiquity has too often given an artificial and constrained tone to his narrative of events which occurred within the range of his own observation. We have to lament—what was to him a cause of self-gratulation—that he has so liberally "seasoned his crude materials with Roman salt." What between his theory and his mode of working it out, we are too often defrauded of information with which we should have been thankful to have been made acquainted, and the result is frequently disappointment and regret.

§ 7. All this, however, is said without the remotest wish to detract from the acknowledged merits of our author as an historian. Taking him at his own stand-point, and judging of his work according to his own abstract estimate of perfection, we cannot but assign to it a high grade of intrinsic excellence. He is cautious

² When Malmesbury died is uncertain. The "Historia Novella" must have been written between A. D. 1142, with which year it concludes, and 1147, in which year the earl died. Dugd. Monast. i. 155; Baron. i. 535.

³ Several of the more important of these are pointed out in the notes to this edition.

⁴ See pp. 4, 5.

how he accepts evidence, calm in the judgment which he pronounces upon disputed questions, and dispassionate when he arbitrates between conflicting interests. His prejudices are generally subservient to his reason. His honest and manly independence of sentiment secures him against the temptation of lending himself either to advocate the theories of a class, or to excuse the errors of an individual, how closely soever he may have been identified with the interests of one, or the passions of the other.¹

§ 8. The work contained in this volume professes to supply the blank which its writer had observed in our national annals, between the death of its sole historian Beda and his own time. The earlier books are founded upon works still extant, Beda, the Saxon Chronicle, Ethelwerd, Asser, and some few others. Malmesbury sometimes refers to materials of a more ephemeral character, such as popular songs and traditions; ² but it is only in a few instances, and those of no great importance, that he makes any substantive addition to our stock of historical knowledge during the Saxon dominion. As it advances nearer his own times, his narrative increases in importance, and his history of the Norman kings is of the highest value.

§ 9. Two editions only of this work are extant. In the year one thousand five hundred and ninety-six the learned Sir Henry Saville included it in the volume to which he gave the title, "Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores post Bedam præcipui," which was reprinted at Frankfort in the year one thousand six hundred and one. For all critical purposes Saville's edition is valueless. He has adopted as the basis of his text a family of manuscripts—for the edition is apparently an eclectic one—of secondary authority, and he has inserted into it various additions and alterations, which, from the absence of any mark of distinction, tend only to perplex and confuse the reader.

§ 10. In this unsatisfactory state the text was suffered to continue until the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, when an edition³ appeared under the auspices of the English Historical Society, and of which the preparation was entrusted to Mr. Hardy, of the Record Office in the Tower. Of this edition it is enough to say, that it is worthy of the editor whose name it bears. The text is reconstructed upon a careful examination of more than seventeen manuscripts, the chief variations of which are recorded; the chronology (respecting which Malmesbury is generally careless, and frequently erroneous) is settled; and a valuable body of notes has been appended. The execution of the whole is such as to leave little to be desired; and the chief merit of the present edition is, that it represents, in a more popularized form, the results of Mr. Hardy's labours.

§ 11. The manuscripts upon which the text of this edition,

A. 1. The Harleian MS. 261, in the British Museum. It is a folio volume, written upon vellum, formerly belonging to the cathedral church of Rochester,¹ to the library in the cloister of which it had been given by Alexander the precentor.

A. 2. The Cottonian MS. Claudius C. ix., in the British Museum; in folio, written upon vellum, in the thirteenth century.

A. 3. A manuscript in the collection of Sir Thomas Phillipps, No. 2777.

C. 1. The Royal MS. 13 B. xix., in the British Museum, written on vellum, in folio, early in the thirteenth century. In the year 1650 it belonged to John Theyer.

C. 2. The Harleian MS. 447, in the British Museum, in folio, written upon vellum, in the thirteenth century, formerly belonging to the monastery of Bury St. Edmunds.²

D. 1. The Royal MS. 13 D. v., in the British Museum, a manuscript written upon vellum, of a large folio size, formerly belonging to the monastery of St. Albans.³

D. 2. The Royal MS. 13 B. xvii., in the British Museum, a transcript of the seventeenth century, in folio, upon paper, formerly belonging to the collections of the lords Arundel and Lumley.

E. 1. The Royal MS. 13 D. xi., upon vellum, in folio, written in the twelfth century, formerly belonging to the monastery of Margan.⁴

E. 2. A manuscript in the possession of Sir Thomas Phillipps, No. 8239.

F. A manuscript in the library of All Souls College, at Oxford, No. 33, written upon vellum, in folio, towards the end of the twelfth century, by one Ivo.⁵

G. The Laud MS. 548, in the Bodleian Library, written towards the end of the twelfth century, upon vellum, in small folio.

¹ It contains two memoranda respecting its former history. The first states it to be the "Liber de claustro Roffensi, Alexandri p'cō;" the second, "Liber S. Andreae Apostoli de Roucestria." No list of the precentors of Rochester being extant, we are unable to fix the date of the gift.

² "Liber Sancti Ædmondi regis et martyris, C. 49."

"Scripserit hunc librum quis, lector forte requiret;
Exacuat sensus, et metra legat, cito discet.
Illius nomen tria componunt elementa,
In numeris quorum primum satis indicat unum,
Ponunt et leges numeri pro quinque secundum,
Si Græcus scribat postremo collige finem."

It was formerly known by the references Laud F. 37, and is No. 1377 in Bernard's General Catalogue.

H. The Hatton MS. 54, in the Bodleian Library [formerly 47], written in quarto, upon vellum, in the fourteenth century. It formerly belonged to John de Whytefeld,¹ monk of Rochester.

K. The Bodley MS. 712, [formerly Sup. Art. D. 20, and Arch. F. 20, No. 2619 in Bernard's General Catalogue,] apparently once the property of Roger Saville, but written for Robert de Wiville, bishop of Salisbury, (A.D. 1330—1375,) whose arms occur more than once in this fine manuscript.

L. 1. The Arundel MS. 35, in the British Museum, written in folio, upon vellum, in the twelfth century, ending, imperfectly, in the middle of § 411, the manuscript being imperfect.

L. 2. The MS. 14, in Trinity College Library, at Cambridge, written upon vellum, in the thirteenth century.

M. The Arundel MS. 161, in the British Museum, in folio, upon vellum, of the thirteenth century; an exact transcript of the Royal MS. 13 D. v. [D.] described above.

Hardy states that, in addition to these manuscripts, several other copies preserved at Oxford, at Cambridge, in the British Museum, and in the library of Sir Thomas Phillipps, were consulted by him in the formation of his text; but that, as they appear to have been taken from some exemplar of one or other of the MS. above-mentioned, he did not think it necessary to refer to them.

§ 12. The manuscript which has been adopted by the editor of the edition issued by the English Historical Society, is that furnished by the Royal MS. 13 D. ii., mentioned above [E.] Preference was given to the text contained in that magnificent copy for several reasons. Not only is there a strong antecedent prejudice in its favour, from the circumstance of it having formerly belonged to the abbey of Margan, founded by Robert² earl of Gloucester, the nobleman to whom Malmesbury dedicates this work—but further, a careful examination and comparison with other manuscripts, proved as well the general accuracy of the text, as also that it contained the latest corrections of the author.

§ 13. It has already been remarked (§ 4) that Malmesbury employed himself in the improvement of his History long after the first edition of it (if we may be allowed the term) had been put into circulation; and so assiduously was the system persevered in, that it is not easy to find two copies (with the exception of the Royal MS. 13 D. v. and Arundel 161) the readings of which exactly correspond. These variations, it is true, sink into comparative insignificance, in consequence of the existence of the Margan copy (§ 12), which represents the latest corrections of the author; still they are not without their interest, and it would be instructive could we succeed in establishing the sequence of these different revisions of the text. Hardy (preface, p. xxii.) believes "that traces may be found of at least four distinct classes of copies of the 'Gesta Regum Anglorum,' and two of the 'Historia Novella.'

² See Dugd. Monast. i. 477.

We have to regret that he has not furnished us with the reasons which led him to this conclusion, or stated under which of these four heads he would have respectively classed the many manuscripts which he has collated for his Variouſ Readings; and this the more eſpecially as he had investigated¹ the matter with much patience, and his intimate acquaintance with the various copies of our author (the reſult of his accurate collation of their ſeveral texts) would have inveſted his remarks with great authority.

§ 14. It is from this text, then, that the tranſlation is made which is contained in our ſeries of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians. It is fundamentally the Engliſh verſion publiſhed in the year one thouſand eight hundred and fifteen, by the Rev. John Sharpe—the merits of which have been long and generally recognised—but ſo corrected and extended as to repreſent the improved text publiſhed by Mr. Hardy in one thouſand eight hundred and forty. The notes of that later edition have been freely uſed in the preparation of this; and much of the value of my labours (ſuch as it is) ariſes from this circumſtance. I have not heſitated, however, to make ſuch omiſſions, alterations and additions, as to me appeared neceſſary, for the ſake of ſecuring uniformity with the reſt of our ſeries; and in ſo doing I have made myſelf reſponſible for the whole.

The Proprietors of this ſeries of Engliſh Church Hiſtorians beg to offer their thanks to the Rev. John Sharpe, B.A., Rector of Caſtle Eaton, Wiltſhire, and to Thomas Duffus Hardy, Eſq., Aſſiſtant Keeper of Her Majeſty's Records, for permiſſion to make free uſe of their reſpective editions of William of Malmesbury.

¹ He writes thus, Preface, p. ix.—“An examination of every point connected with the ſubject has been made; but with anything beyond the mere reſult it ſeems unneceſſary to burthen theſe remarks. That Malmesbury, after he had publiſhed his work, was in the conſtant habit of correcting it, is beyond doubt.”

MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF THE KINGS.

THE AUTHOR'S EPISTLE¹ TO ROBERT EARL OF GLOUCESTER, SON OF KING HENRY THE FIRST.²

To my respected lord, the renowned earl Robert, son of the king, greeting; and, if aught they may avail, his prayers, from William, monk of Malmesbury.

The virtue of celebrated men holds forth as its greatest excellence, its tendency to excite the love of persons even far removed from it: hence the lower classes make the virtues of their superiors their own, by venerating those great actions to the practice of which they themselves cannot aspire. Moreover it redounds altogether to the glory of exalted characters, both that they do good, and that they gain the affection of their inferiors. To you therefore, princes, it is owing that we act well; to you, indeed, that we compose anything worthy of remembrance: your exertions incite us to make you live for ever in our writings, in return for the dangers which you undergo to secure our tranquillity. For this reason I have deemed it proper to dedicate the History of the Kings of England, which I have lately published, more especially to you, my respected and truly amiable lord. None surely can be a more suitable patron of the liberal arts than yourself, in whom combine the magnanimity of your grandfather, the munificence of your uncle,³ the circumspection of your father; more especially as you add to the qualities of these men, whom while you equal in industry, you resemble in person, this characteristic peculiarly your own, a devotion to learning. Nor is this all: you even condescend to honour with your notice, those literary characters who are kept in obscurity either by the malevolence of fame, or the slenderness of their fortune. And as our nature inclines us not to condemn in others what we approve in ourselves, therefore men of learning find in you manners which are congenial to their own; for, without the slightest indication of moroseness, you regard them with kindness, admit them with complacency, and dismiss them with regret.¹ Indeed, the greatness of your fortune has made no difference in you, except that your beneficence can now almost keep pace with your inclination.

² Robert earl of Gloucester was one of the natural children of Henry I. He married Maud, or Mabell as she is sometimes called, the eldest co-heir of Robert Fitz-Hamon, and in her right had the honour of Gloucester. He died on the 31st of October, 1147. Dugd. Baron. i. 534.

³ An allusion probably to Robert duke of Normandy, to whose munificence Malmesbury more than once alludes in this work.

Accept then, most illustrious sir, a work in which you may contemplate yourself as in a glass, where your highness's sagacity will discover that you have imitated the actions of the most exalted characters, even before you could have heard their names. The preface to the first book declares the contents of the work; on deigning to peruse which, you will briefly collect the whole subject-matter. Thus much I must request from your excellency, that no blame may attach to me because my narrative often wanders wide from the limits of England, since I design this as a compendium of many histories, although, with reference to the larger portion of it, I have entitled it an "History of the Kings of England."

P R E F A C E.

Here begins the Prologue of William, Monk of Malmesbury, to the First Book of the History of the Kings of England.

THE history of the English, from their arrival in Britain to his own times, has been written by Beda, a man of singular learning and modesty, in a clear and captivating style.² After him you will not, in my opinion, easily find any person who has attempted to compose the history of this people in Latin. Let others declare if their researches in this respect have been, or are likely to be, fortunate: mine, though diligent in the extreme, have down to this period been without reward. There are indeed some notices of antiquity, written in the vernacular tongue after the manner of a chronicle,³ and arranged according to the years of our Lord. By means of these, the times succeeding this man have escaped the canker of oblivion: for of Elward,⁴ a noble and illustrious character, who attempted to arrange these chronicles in Latin, and whose intention I could applaud if his language did not disgust me, it were better to be silent. It has not escaped my knowledge that there is also a work of Edmer,⁵ written with a chastened elegance

² Venerable Beda, who died in A. D. 735, wrote, besides a great number of other works, "The Ecclesiastical History of the English," which is here referred to, and of which a translation has already been given.

⁴ Elward, or, as he is more commonly designated, Ethelwerd, was descended from Ethelred, the brother of king Alfred. His work, consisting of an abridged translation into Latin of the Saxon Chronicle, merits the censure pronounced upon it by Malmesbury. Yet it is too important to be passed over, and accordingly a translation of it has already been given in the present series of writers, ii. 405.

of style; in which, beginning from king Edgar, he hastily glances at the times down to William the First; and thence, taking a freer range, gives a narrative, copious, and of great utility to the studious, until the death of archbishop Anselm.¹ Thus, from the time of Beda, there is a period of two hundred and twenty-three years left unnoticed in his history; so that the regular series of time, unsupported by written evidence, halts in the middle. This circumstance has induced me, as well out of love to my country as respect for the authority of those who have enjoined me the undertaking, to fill up the chasm, and to season the crude materials with Roman art; and that the work may proceed with greater regularity, I shall cull somewhat from Beda, whom I must often quote, glancing at a few facts, but omitting more.

The first book, therefore, contains a succinct account of the English, from the time of their descent on Britain till that of king Egbert, who obtained the monarchy of almost the whole island; its former potentates having been dispatched by various fates.

But as among the English arose four very powerful kingdoms, that is to say, those of Kent, of the West Saxons, of the Northumbrians, and of the Mercians, of which I purpose severally to treat, if I have leisure, I shall begin with that which attained the earliest maturity, and was also the first to decay. This I shall do more clearly, if I place the kingdoms of the East Angles and of the East Saxons after the others, as not meriting either my labours, or the regard of posterity.

The second book will contain the history of the kings till the coming of the Normans.

The three following books will be employed upon the history of three successive kings, with the addition of whatever in their times happened elsewhere, which from its celebrity may demand a more particular notice.

This then is what I purpose, if the Divine favour shall smile on my undertaking, and carry me safely by those rocks of rugged diction, on which Elward, in his search after sounding and far-fetched phrases, so unhappily suffered shipwreck. "Should any one, however," to use the poet's expression,

"Peruse this work with sensible delight,"²

I deem it necessary to acquaint him, that I vouch nothing for the truth of long past transactions, but the consonance of the period: the veracity of the relation itself must rest with its authors. Whatever I have recorded of later times, I have either myself seen, or heard from credible authority. Moreover in either part, I pay but little respect to the judgment of my contemporaries, trusting that I shall gain with posterity, when love and hatred shall be no more, if not the reputation of eloquence, at least the credit of industry.

THE HISTORY, &c.

BOOK I.

§ 1. IN the year of the incarnation of our Lord four hundred and forty-nine,¹ came the Angles and Saxons into Britain; and although the cause of their arrival be universally known, it may not be improper here to subjoin it: and, that the design of my work may be the more manifest, I shall begin even from an earlier period. That Britain, compelled by Julius Cæsar to submit to the Roman power, was held in high estimation by that people, may be collected from their history, and be seen also in the ruins of their ancient buildings. Even their emperors, sovereigns of almost all the world, eagerly embraced opportunities of sailing hither, and of spending their days here. Finally, Severus and Constantius, two of their greatest princes, died² upon the island, and were there interred with the highest pomp. The former, to defend this province from the incursion of the barbarians, built his celebrated and well-known wall from sea to sea. The latter, a man, as they report, of courteous manners, left Constantine,³ his son by Helena, a tender of cattle,⁴ a youth of great promise, his heir. Constantine, greeted emperor by the army, led away, in an expedition destined to the continent, a numerous force of British soldiers, by whose exertions, the war succeeding to his wishes, he gained in a short time the summit of power. For these deserving veterans, when their toil was over, he founded a colony on the western coast of Gaul, where to this day their descendants, somewhat differing in language and manners from their parent stock, remain with wonderful increase.⁵

§ 2. In succeeding times, in this island, Maximus,⁶ a man well fitted for command, had he not aspired to power in defiance of his oath, assumed the purple, as though compelled by the army, and preparing immediately for his passage over into Gaul, he despoiled the province of almost all its military force. Not long after, also, one Constantine,⁷ who had been elected emperor there on account of his name, drained its whole remaining warlike strength; but

⁴ "Ex Helena stabularia." Helena's origin has been much contested: Gibbon decides that she was daughter of an innkeeper. The word "stabularia" literally implies an Ostler-wench; and it has been conjectured that it was applied to her, by the Jews and heathen, on account of her building a church on the spot where stood the stable in which our Lord was born. On this question see Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Antiq. p. 97, ed. fol. Lond. 1687.

both being slain, the one by Theodosius, the other by Honorius, they became examples of the instability of human greatness. Of the forces which followed them, part shared the fate of their leaders; the rest fled to the continental Britons.¹ Thus, when these ambitious men had left none but half-savages in the country, and, in the towns, those only who were given up to luxury, Britain, despoiled of the support of its youthful² population, and bereft of every useful art, became for a long time subject to the rapacity of neighbouring nations.

§ 3. For immediately, by an incursion of the Scots and Picts, numbers of the people were slain, their villages burnt, their towns destroyed, and everything laid waste by fire and sword. Of the harassed islanders, who thought anything more advisable than contending in battle, some fled for safety to the mountains; others, burying their treasures in the earth, many of which are dug up in these present times, proceeded to Rome to ask assistance. The Romans touched with pity, and deeming nothing more important than yielding succour³ to the faltering condition of their allies, twice extended their aid, and defeated the enemy. But at length, wearied with the distant voyage, they decline returning in future; exhorting them not to degenerate from the martial energy of their ancestors, but to learn to defend their country with spirit and with arms. They accompany their advice with the plan of a wall, to be built for their defence; the mode of keeping watch on the ramparts; of sallying out against an enemy, should it be necessary; together with other duties of military discipline. After giving these admonitions, they depart,⁴ accompanied by the tears of the miserable inhabitants; and favouring fortune, smiling on their progress, restored them to their country. The Scots, learning the improbability of their return, immediately began to make fresh and more than usual irruptions against the Britons, to level their wall, to kill the few opponents they met with, and to carry off considerable booty; while those who escaped flew to the royal residence, imploring the protection of their sovereign.

§ 4. At this time Vortigern was king of Britain; a man calculated neither for the field nor the council, but wholly given up to the lusts of the flesh, the slave of every vice, a character of insatiable avarice, ungovernable pride, unquenchable lust. To complete the picture, as we read in the History of the Britons,⁵ he had defiled his own daughter, who was lured to the participation of such a crime by the hope of sharing his kingdom, and she had borne him a son. Regardless of treasure at this dreadful juncture, and wasting the resources of the kingdom in riotous living, he was awake only to the blandishments of abandoned women. Roused at length, however, by the clamours of the people, he summons a council, to take the sense of his nobility on the state of public affairs. To be brief, it was unanimously resolved to invite¹ over from Germany the Angles and Saxons, nations powerful in arms, but of a roving life. It was conceived that this would be for their mutual advantage: by their skill in war, it was said these people would easily subdue their enemies; and, having no certain habitation, would in return gladly accept even an unproductive soil, provided it afforded them a stationary residence; moreover, that they could not be suspected of ever entertaining a design against the country, since the remembrance of this kindness would soften their native ferocity. This counsel was adopted, and ambassadors, men of rank, and worthy to represent the country, were sent into Germany.

§ 5. The Germans, hearing that very thing voluntarily offered, which they had long anxiously desired, readily accepted the invitation; their joy quickening their haste. Bidding adieu therefore to their native fields, and renouncing the ties of kindred, they spread their sails to fortune, and, with a favouring breeze, arrive² in Britain in three of those long vessels which they call "cools."³ At this and other times, came over a mixed multitude from three⁴ of the German nations; that is to say, Angles, Saxons, and Jutes.⁵ Indeed, almost all the country lying to the north of the British ocean, though divided into many provinces, is justly denominated Germany, from its germinating so many men. And as the pruner cuts off the more luxuriant branches of the tree to impart a livelier vigour to the remainder, so the inhabitants of this country assist their common parent by the expulsion of a part of their members, lest she should perish by giving sustenance to too numerous an offspring; but, in order to obviate discontent, they cast lots who shall be compelled to migrate. Hence the men of this country have made a virtue of necessity, and, when driven from their native soil, have gained foreign settlements by force of arms: as did the Vandals, for instance, who formerly overran Africa; the Goths, who made themselves masters of Spain; the Lombards, who, even at the present time, are settled in Italy; and the Normans, who have given their own name to that part of Gaul which they subdued. From Germany, then, came at first into Britain an incon-

⁵ One MS. (Claud. c. ix.) reads "Wichtis," a variation, the importance of which will be seen by reference to the work last quoted, § 16. The same reading is repeated at the end of this paragraph.

siderable number indeed, but well able by their courage to make up for their paucity. They were under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa, two brothers of suitable disposition, and of noble race in their own country. They were great-grandsons of that most celebrated Woden, from whom almost all the royal families of these barbarous nations deduce their origin, and to whom the nations of the Angles, fondly deifying him, have consecrated by immemorial superstition the fourth day of the week, as they have the sixth to his wife Frea. Beda¹ has related in what particular parts of Britain the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes fixed their habitations: my design, however, is not to dilate, though there be abundance of materials for the purpose, but to touch only on what is necessary.

§ 6. The Angles were eagerly met on all sides upon their arrival: ² from the king they received thanks, from the people expressions of good-will. Faith was plighted on either side, and the Isle of Thanet was appropriated for their residence. It was agreed, moreover, that they should exert their invincible prowess in arms for the service of the country; and should, in return, receive soldiers' pay from the people whose safety they watched over. Ere long the Angles make an attack upon the Scots, who were advancing upon them, and as usual secure, as they supposed, of a great booty with very little difficulty. However, scarcely had they engaged before they were put to flight, the cavalry pursuing and destroying the fugitives. Contests of this kind were frequent; and, victory constantly siding with the Angles, it happened, as is customary in human affairs, that while success inflamed the courage of one party, dread increased the cowardice of the other, and so the Scots in the end avoided nothing so cautiously as an engagement with the Angles.

§ 7. In the meantime Hengist, not less keen in perception than ardent in the field, (Vortigern not objecting,) sends back some of his followers to his own country, for the purpose of representing the indolence of the king and people, the opulence of the island, and the prospect of advantage which it afforded to new adventurers. Having executed their commission adroitly, in a short time they return with sixteen ships, bringing with them the daughter³ of Hengist, a maiden (as we have heard) who might justly be called the master-piece of nature, and the admiration of mankind. At an entertainment provided for them on their return, Hengist commanded his daughter to assume the office of cup-bearer, that she might gratify the eyes of the king as he sat at table. Nor was the design unsuccessful; for he, ever neighing after female beauty, deeply smitten with the gracefulness of her form and the elegance of her carriage, instantly conceived a vehement desire for the possession of her person, and immediately proposed marriage to her father; urging him to a measure to which he was already more than sufficiently inclined. Hengist, at first, kept up the artifice by a refusal, stating that so humble a connexion was disgraceful to a king; but at last, appearing to consent with reluctance, he gave way to his importunities, and accepted, as a reward, the whole of Kent, where all justice had long since declined under the administration of a "Gorong,"¹ who, like the other potentates of the island, was subject to the monarchy of Vortigern. Not satisfied with this liberality, but abusing the imprudence of the king, the barbarian persuaded him to send for his brother and son,² men of warlike talents, from Germany, pretending that he would defend the province on the east, while they might curb the Scots on the northern frontier. The king assenting, they arrived at the Orkney Isles; after sailing round Britain, and involving those people, together with the Picts and Scots, in equal calamity, at this and after times, they settled in the northern part of the island, now called Northumbria. Still no one there assumed the royal title or ornaments till the time of Ida, from whom sprang the regal line of the Northumbrians; but of this hereafter. Now to the present labour.

Concerning Wortemer, the Son of Vortigern; and of Arthur.

§ 8. Wortemer, the son of Vortigern, thinking it unnecessary longer to dissemble that he saw himself and his Britons circumvented by the craft of the Angles, turned his thoughts to their expulsion, and stimulated his father to make the attempt. At his suggestion, the truce was broken seven years after their arrival; and during the ensuing twenty, they had frequent skirmishes,³ and, as the Chronicle⁴ relates, four general actions. From the first conflict they retired on equal terms: one party deeply lamenting the loss of Hors,⁵ the brother of Hengist; the other, that of Katigis,⁶ another of Vortigern's sons. The Angles having the advantage in all succeeding encounters, peace was concluded; Wortemer, the instigator of the war, being taken off by an untimely fate; he, far differing from the indolence of his father, would have

¹ Hardy remarks that "this word has been frequently mistaken for a proper name, and that Camden defines a Guorong to be a viceroy or freeman. See Camd. Brit. col. 187, edit. Gibson. Lond. 1695."

² Ebusa and Otha were the names of Hengist's brother and son. See § 8, ad fin.; and § 44, ad init.

⁴ Malmesbury alludes to the Saxon Chronicle, which gives these dates of the battles: at Eglesford (Aylesford, on the Medway), A. D. 455; at Creanford (Crayford), in 457; at Wyppedesfleote (Ebbsfleet, in the Isle of Thanet, near Stonar), in 465; and the fourth in the year 473, the place not mentioned. Nennius, § 44, describes the battles as having been fought, "super flumen Derevent" (Darent, in Kent, probably at the spot where it is joined by the Cray), at Episford, or Rit Hergabail, supposed to be Aylesford, and "in campo juxta Lapidem tituli" (Stonar, in the Isle of Thanet; by some, Folkstone, in Kent).

governed the kingdom in a noble manner, had God permitted. When this man died, the British strength decayed; their hopes, becoming diminished, fled; and they would have soon perished altogether, had not Ambrosius,¹ the sole survivor of the Romans, who became monarch after Vortigern, quelled the presumptuous barbarians by the powerful aid of warlike Arthur. This is that Arthur,² of whom the Britons fondly fable³ even to the present day; a man worthy to be celebrated, not by idle fictions, but in authentic history. He, indeed, for a long time upheld the sinking state, and roused the broken spirit of his countrymen to war. Finally, at the siege⁴ of Mount Badon,⁵ relying on an image⁶ of the Virgin which he had affixed to his armour, he engaged nine hundred of the enemy single-handed, and dispersed them with incredible slaughter. On the other side, the Angles, although they underwent great vicissitudes of fortune, filled up their wavering battalions with fresh supplies of their countrymen; rushed with greater courage to the conflict, and extended themselves by degrees, as the natives retreated, over the whole island; the counsels of God, in whose hand is every change of empire, not opposing their career. But this was effected in process of time; for while Vortigern lived, no new attempt was made against them. About this time, Hengist, from that bad quality of the human heart, of always grasping after more, the more it possesses, with a treacherous design, invited his son-in-law and three hundred of his followers to an entertainment; and when, by more than usual computations, he had made them ready for strife, he began, purposely, to taunt them severally with sarcastic raillery: this had the effect of making them first quarrel, and then come to blows. Thus the Britons,

² He was the hereditary prince of the Silures, in South Wales. Malmesbury here observes of him, that he was a man worthy to be celebrated, not by idle fictions, but by authentic history. It has by some been doubted whether he ever existed, because Gildas, a coeval historian, makes no mention of such a person. Higden, the author of the Polychronicon, appears to have been the first writer who doubted whether such a king as Arthur ever reigned in Britain. The following is a translation of his words:—"Concerning Arthur, whom Geoffrey, alone of chronologers, extols, many wonder how the things which are related of him can be true; because if Arthur, as Geoffrey relates, acquired thirty kingdoms, subdued the king of France, killed Lucius, governor of the republic of Italy, why have all historians, Roman, French, Saxon, and British, omitted so many great acts of such a man, when they have related so many deeds of inferior men?" Geoffrey of Monmouth first collected, from the bards of Wales and Armorica, the traditions of his exploits, and translated them into Latin. Concerning Arthur, see Nennius, § 56.

basely murdered to a man, breathed their last amid their cups. The king himself having been made captive, purchased his liberty at the price of three provinces. In the thirty-ninth year after his arrival died Hengist, a man who, urging his success not less by artifice than courage, and giving free scope to his natural ferocity, preferred effecting his purpose by cruelty rather than by kindness. He left a son named Eisc, who, more intent on defending than enlarging his dominions, never exceeded his paternal bounds. At the expiration of twenty-four years, he had for his successors his son Oth, and Oth's son, Yrmenric, who, in their manners, resembled him, rather than their grandfather and great-grandfather. To the times of both, the Chronicles¹ assign fifty-three years; but whether they reigned singly or together does not appear.

Concerning King Ethelberht, and of the coming of S. Augustine.

§ 9. After them Ethelbert, the son of Yrmenric, reigned fifty-three² years according to the Chronicles; fifty-six according to Beda.³ Let the reader see for himself how this difference is to be reconciled; as I think it sufficient to have apprised him of it, I shall let the matter rest. In the infancy of his reign, he was so much an object of contempt to the neighbouring kings, that, being defeated in two battles, he could scarcely defend his frontier; but afterwards, when to his riper years he had added a more discreet knowledge of war, by successive victories, he subjugated every kingdom of the Angles, with the exception of the Northumbrians. And, in order to obtain foreign connexions, he entered into affinity with the king of France,⁴ by marrying his daughter. Then, indeed, by its association with the Franks, the nation, hitherto savage and wedded to its own customs, began daily to divest itself of its rustic propensities, and incline to gentler manners. To this was added the very exemplary life of bishop Letard,⁵ who had come over with the queen, by which, though silently, he allured the king to the knowledge of Christ our Lord. Hence it arose that his mind, already softened, easily yielded to the preaching of the blessed Augustine;⁶ and, first of all his race, he renounced the errors of paganism, that he might obscure by the glory of his faith those whom he surpassed in power. This, indeed, is spotless nobility; this, exalted virtue; to excel in worth those whom you exceed in rank. Besides extending his concern to posterity, he enacted laws,⁷ in his native tongue, in which he appointed rewards for the

² The contradictory statements here alluded to by Malmesbury still remain unexplained. The entries of the Saxon Chronicle are irreconcilable with each other. It is there stated that Ethelbert succeeded to the throne in 565, and reigned fifty-three years; and again, under 616, he is said to have then died after a reign of fifty-six years. Wheloc fixes the commencement of his reign in 560, but on what authority does not appear.

§ 10. Ethelbert died¹ in the twenty-first year after he had embraced the faith, leaving his diadem to his son Edbald. He, as soon as he was freed from the restraints of paternal awe, rejecting Christianity, overcame the virtue of his stepmother² also. But the severity of the Divine mercy opposed a barrier to his utter destruction; for immediately the princes, whom his father had subjugated, rebelling, he lost a part of his dominions, and being perpetually haunted by an evil spirit, he paid the penalty of his obstinate unbelief. While Laurence,³ the successor of Augustine, offended at these transactions, after having sent away his companions, was meditating his own departure out of the country, he was induced by the chastisement of God to change his resolution.⁴ The king conversing with him on the subject, and finding his assertions confirmed by his stripes, became, they say, easily converted, accepted the grace of Christianity, and broke off his incestuous intercourse. But that posterity might be impressed with the singular punishment due to apostasy, it was with difficulty he could maintain his hereditary dominions, much less rival the eminence of his father. For the remainder of his life, his faith was sound, and he did nothing to sully his reputation. The monastery also, which his father had founded without the walls of Canterbury,⁵ he enriched with large estates, and most sumptuous presents. The praises and merits of both these men ought ever to be proclaimed, and had in honour by the English, because they allowed the christian faith to acquire strength in England, by calm assent and dispassionate belief. For who can contemplate, without satisfaction, the just and amiable answer which Beda relates king Ethelbert to have given to the first preaching of Augustine?—"That he could not thus early embrace a new doctrine and leave the worship which he had always practised in common with the whole English nation; but still it was his opinion, that persons who had undertaken so long a journey for the purpose of kindly communicating to the Angles what they deemed an inestimable benefit, far from meeting with ill-treatment, ought rather to be allowed full liberty to preach, and also to receive the amplest maintenance." He fully kept his promise; and at length the truth of Christianity becoming apparent by degrees, he and his subjects were admitted into the number of the faithful. And what did the other? Though led away at first, more by the lusts of the flesh than perverseness of heart, yet did he not pay great respect to the virtuous conduct of the prelates, although he neglected their faith? And lastly, as I have related, being easily converted through the sufferings of Laurence, he became of infinite service to the propagation of Christianity. Both, then, were laudable; nay, both deserving higher encomiums: for the good work, so nobly begun by the one, was as kindly fostered by the other.

² After the death of Bertha, Aethelberht married another French princess; but her name is not mentioned by historians, probably on account of her incest with Eadbald. See Beda, E. H. § 102, and Saxon Chron. A. D. 616.

§ 11. To him,¹ after a reign of twenty-four years, succeeded Ercombircht his son, by Emma,² daughter of a king of France. He reigned an equal number of years with his father, but under happier auspices; alike remarkable for piety towards God, and love to his country. For his grandfather and father, indeed, adopted our faith, but neglected to destroy their idols; whilst he, thinking it derogatory to his royal zeal not to take the readiest mode of annihilating openly what they only secretly condemned,³ levelled every temple of their gods to the ground, that not a trace of their paganism might be handed down to posterity. This was nobly done, because the mass of the people would be reminded of their fanatic superstition, so long as they could see the altars of their deities. In order, also, that he might teach his subjects, too much given to sensual indulgence, to accustom themselves to temperance, he enjoined the solemn fast of Lent⁴ to be observed throughout his dominions. This was an extraordinary act for the king to attempt in those times; but he was a man whom no blandishments of luxury could enervate, no cares of empire seduce from the worship of God. Wherefore, protected by the favour of the Almighty, and everything at home and abroad succeeding to his wishes, he grew old in uninterrupted tranquillity. His daughter Ercongota,⁵ a child worthy such a parent, and emulating her father in virtuous qualities, became a shining light in the monastery of Cala in Gaul.⁶

§ 12. His son Egbert, retaining his father's throne for nine years,⁷ did nothing memorable in so short a reign; unless, indeed, it be ascribed to the glory of this period, that now arrived Theodore the archbishop, and Adrian the abbot, two scholars who were thoroughly versed in all branches of learning. Were not the subject already trite, I should willingly record what light they shed upon the British hemisphere; how on one side the Greeks, and on the other the Latins, emulously contributing their knowledge to the public stock, made this island, once the nurse of tyrants, the constant residence of philosophy.⁸

§ 13. To Egbert succeeded his brother Lothaire, who began his reign with unpropitious omens. For being harassed during eleven years⁹ by Edric, the son of Egbert, and engaged in many civil conflicts which terminated with various success, he was ultimately pierced through the body with a dart, and died while they were applying remedies to the wound. Some say that both the brothers perished by a premature death, as a just return for their cruelty, because Egbert murdered the innocent children of his uncle ;¹ and Lothaire ridiculed the notion of holding them up as martyrs, although the former had bewailed the action, and had granted a part of the Isle of Thanet to the mother of his nephews, for the purpose of building a monastery.

⁷ Namely, from 664 to 673. See id. iv. 5 and 26.

§ 14. Nor could Edric long boast the prosperous state of his government ; for within two years, being despoiled both of kingdom and of life, he left his country to be torn in pieces by its enemies. For immediately Kedwalla with his brother Moll, in other respects a good and able man, breathing an inextinguishable hatred against the people of Kent, made vigorous attempts upon the province ; supposing it must easily surrender to his views, as it had lately been in the enjoyment of long continued peace, but at that time was torn with intestine war. But he found the inhabitants by no means unprepared or void of courage, as he had expected : for, after many losses sustained in the towns and villages, at length they rushed with spirit to the conflict. Superior in the contest, they put Kedwalla to flight, and driving his brother into a little cottage, they set it on fire. Thus, wanting courage to sally out against the enemy, and the fire gaining uncontrolled power, Moll perished in the flames.² Nevertheless Kedwalla ceased not his efforts, nor retired from the province ; but soothing his sufferings at the repeated expense of the inhabitants, he left the avenging of this injury to Ina, his successor, as will be related in its place.³

§ 15. In this desperate state of the affairs of Kent, there was a void of about six years in the royal succession. In the seventh,⁴ Wihtried, the son of Egbert, having repressed the malevolence of his countrymen by his activity, and purchased a peace from his enemies by money, was chosen king⁵ by the inhabitants, who entertained great and well-founded hopes of him. For, an admirable ruler at home, and invincible in war, he was a truly holy follower of the christian faith, extending its power to the utmost ;⁶ and, to complete his felicity, after thirty-three years⁷ reign, he died in extreme old age, which mortals reckon most happy, leaving his three children his heirs. Of these, Edbert for twenty-three, Edelbert for eleven,⁸ and

² This narrative is founded upon the statement of the Saxon Chronicle, A. D. 686, 687.

³ See § 35.

Alric¹ for thirty-four years, regarding the ordinances of their father, conducted the government in a similar manner; except that Edelbert, by the casual burning of the city, and Alric, by an unsuccessful battle with the Mercians, considerably obscured the glory of their times. Thus, if anything disgraceful occurs, it is not concealed, if anything fortunate, it is not sufficiently noticed in the Chronicles; whether it be done designedly, or whether it arise from that bad quality of the human mind, which makes the regard for what is good transient, whereas the recollection of evil remains for ever. After these men the noble stock of kings began to wither, the royal blood to flow cold. Then every daring adventurer, who had acquired riches by his eloquence, or whom faction had made formidable, aspired to the kingdom, and disgraced the ensigns of royalty. Of these Edelbert, otherwise called Pren,² after having governed Kent two years, overrating his power in a war with the Mercians, was taken by them, fettered, and put in prison; but being soon afterwards set at liberty by his enemies, though not received by his own subjects, it is uncertain by what end he perished. Cuthred, heir to the same faction and calamity, reigned, in name only, for eight years. Next Baldred, the abortion of royal dignity, after having for eighteen years possessed³ the kingdom of Kent, went into exile, on his defeat by Egbert, king of the West Saxons. Thus the kingdom of Kent, which, from the year of the incarnation of our Lord four hundred and forty-nine,⁴ had continued three hundred and seventy-five years, became annexed to another.⁵ And since, by briefly tracing the royal line of the first kingdom which arose among the Angles, I have elicited a spark, as it were, from the embers of antiquity, I shall now endeavour to throw light on the kingdom of the West Saxons, which, though after a considerable lapse of time, next sprung up. This, with an extensive territory, while the others wasted away neglected, flourished with unconquerable vigour, even to the coming of the Normans; and, if I may be permitted the expression, with greedy jaws swallowed up the rest. Wherefore, after tracing this kingdom in detail down to Egbert, I shall, avoiding prolixity for fear of disgust, subjoin some notices of the two remaining; which finding a suitable termination in the first book, the second will embrace the West Saxons alone.

death of Eadberht (with whom he had previously conjointly reigned twenty-three years), and that Alric reigned thirty-four years after the death of Aethelberht. This would be quite consistent with other authorities, which state that upon the death of Wihtraed, his sons Eadberht and Aethelberht jointly succeeded. The former died in the year 748, and the latter reigned alone until the year 761; he was succeeded by Alric, who died in the year 794.

soon increased to great importance. He was a German by nation, of noblest race, being the tenth from Woden;¹ and having nurtured his ambition in domestic broils, determined to depart from his native land, and extend his fame by the sword. Having formed this daring resolution, he communicated his design to Cenric his son, and on his assenting, (for he closely followed his father's track to glory,) he transported his forces into Britain in five ceols.² This took place in the year of our Saviour's incarnation four hundred and ninety-five, and the eighth after the death of Hengist. Coming into action with the Britons on the very day of his arrival, this experienced soldier soon defeated an undisciplined multitude, and compelled them to fly. By this success he obtained perfect security in future for himself, as well as peace for the inhabitants of those parts; for never daring after that day to attack him, they voluntarily submitted to his dominion. Nevertheless he did not waste his time in indolence, but, on the contrary, extending his conquests on all sides, by the time he had been twenty-four years³ upon the island, he had obtained the supremacy of the western part of it, called West Sex. He died after enjoying it fifteen years,⁴ and his whole kingdom, with the exception of the Isle of Wight, descended to his son. This, by the royal munificence, became subject to his nephew, Wiltgar;⁵ who, as dear to his uncle by the ties of kindred⁶ as by his skill in war, formed a noble principality in the island, where he was afterwards splendidly interred.⁷ Cenric moreover, as illustrious as his father, after twenty-six years,⁸ bequeathed the kingdom, somewhat enlarged, to his son Ceaulin.

Concerning Ceaulin.

§ 17. The Chronicles extol the singular valour of this man in battle, so as to excite a degree of envious admiration; for he was the astonishment of the Angles, the detestation of the Britons, and the destruction of both. I shall briefly subjoin some extracts from them. Attacking Ethelbirth, king of Kent,⁹—a man in other respects laudable, but at that time endeavouring, from consciousness of his family's dignity, to gain the ascendancy, and, on this account, making too eager incursions on the territories of his neighbours,—he routed his troops, and forced him to retreat. The Britons, who, in the times of his father and grandfather, had escaped destruction either by a show of submission, or by the strength of their fortifications at Gloucester, Cirencester, and Bath, he now pursued with ceaseless rancour ;¹ ejected them from their cities, and chased them into mountainous and woody districts, as at the present day. But about this time, as some unlucky throw of the dice in the table of human life perpetually disappoints mankind, his military successes were clouded by domestic calamity. His brother Cuda² met an untimely death, and he had a son of the same name cut off in battle ; both young men of great expectation, whose loss frequently caused him to bewail his diminished felicity. Finally, in his latter days, he himself, banished from his kingdom, presented a spectacle pitiable even to his enemies ; for having sounded, as it were, the trumpet of his own detestation on all sides, the Angles as well as the Britons conspired against him, and his forces being destroyed at Wodensdik,³ he lost his kingdom thirty-one years after he had assumed it,⁴ went into exile, and shortly after died. The floating reins of government were then directed by his nephews, the sons of Cuda, that is to say, Celric⁵ during five,⁶ Ceolwulf⁷ during fourteen years : of these the inferior with respect to age, but the more excellent in spirit, passed all his days in war, nor ever neglected for a moment the protection and extension of his empire.

§ 18. After him, the sons⁸ of Celric, Cinegisl and Quicelm, jointly put on the ensigns of royalty ; both active, both contending with each other only in mutual offices of kindness, insomuch that, to their contemporaries, they were a miracle of concord very unusual amongst princes, and to posterity an example worthy of imitation. It is difficult to say whether their courage or their moderation exceeded, in the numberless contests in which they engaged both against the Britons,⁹ and against Penda,¹⁰ king of the Mercians, a man, as will be related in its place, wonderfully expert in the subtleties of war, and who, overpassing the limits of his own territory, in an attempt to add Cirencester to his possessions, being unable to withstand the power of these united kings, escaped with a few followers. A considerable degree of guilt, indeed, attaches to Quicelm, for attempting to cut off, by the hands of an assassin, Edwin,¹¹ king of the Northumbrians, a man of acknowledged prudence. Yet, if the heathen maxim,¹²—be considered, he will be readily excused, as having done nothing uncommon in wishing to get rid, by whatever means, of an encroaching rival on his power ; for he had formerly lopped off much from the West-Saxon empire, and now receiving fresh ground of offence, and his ancient enmity reviving, he inflicted heavy calamities on the people. The kings, however, escaped, and were, not long after, enlightened with the heavenly doctrine, by the means of Birinus¹ the bishop, in the twenty-fifth year of their reign, and the fortieth after the coming of the blessed Augustine. Cinegisl,² vailing his princely pride, received immediately and willingly the rite of baptism: Quicelm³ resisted for a time, but warned, by the sickness of his body, not to endanger the salvation of his soul, he became a sharer in his brother's piety, and died the same year. Cinegisl died six years afterwards, in the thirty-first year of his reign, enjoying the happiness of a long-extended peace.

§ 19. Kenwalk⁴ his son succeeded: in the beginning of his reign, to be compared only to the worst of princes; but in the succeeding and latter periods, a rival of the best. The moment the young man became possessed of power, wantoning in regal luxury, and disregarding the acts of his father, he abjured Christianity and legitimate marriage: but being attacked and defeated by Penda, king of Mercia, whose sister he had repudiated, he fled to the king of the East Angles.⁵ Here, by a sense of his own calamities and by the perseverance of his host, he was once more brought back to the Christian faith;⁶ and after three years, recovering his strength and resuming his kingdom, he exhibited to his subjects the joyful miracle of his reformation; and so valiant was he, that he who formerly was unable to defend his own territories, now extended his dominion on every side. He totally defeated in two actions the Britons, furious with the recollection of their ancient liberty, and in consequence perpetually meditating resistance; first, at a place called Wirtgernesburg,⁷ and then at a mountain named Pene;⁸ and again, avenging the injury of his father on Wulfer, the son of Penda, he deprived him of the greatest part of his kingdom. Moreover, so religious was he, that, first of all his race, he built, for those times, a most beautiful church at Winchester, on which site afterwards was founded the episcopal seat, with more skilful magnificence.

⁹But since we have arrived at the times of Kenewalch, and the proper place occurs for mentioning the monastery of Glastonbury, I shall trace, from its very origin, the rise and progress of that church, as far as I am able to discover it from the mass of evidences. It is related in annals of good credit, that Lucius, king of the Britons, sent to pope Eleutherius, thirteenth in succession from St. Peter, to entreat that he would dispel the darkness of Britain by the light of Christian instruction. This surely was the commendable deed of a magnanimous prince, eagerly to seek that faith, the mention of which had barely reached him, at a time when it was an object of persecution by almost every king and people to whom it was offered. In consequence, preachers, sent by Eleutherius, came into Britain, the effects of whose labours will remain for ever, although the rust of antiquity may have obliterated their names.¹ By these was built the ancient church of St. Mary of Glastonbury, as faithful tradition has handed down through decaying time. Moreover, there are documents of no small credit, which have been discovered in certain places, to the following effect:—“No other hands than those of the disciples of Christ erected the church of Glastonbury.” Nor is it inconsistent with probability: for if Philip the apostle preached to the Gauls, as Freulfus² relates in the fourth chapter of his second book, it may be believed that he also planted the Word on the hither side of the channel. But that I may not seem to disappoint my readers’ expectation by vain imaginations, leaving all doubtful matter, I shall proceed to the relation of substantial truths.

Of the Church of Glastonbury.

§ 20. The church of which we are speaking, from its antiquity called by the Angles, by way of distinction, “Ealde Chirche,” that is, the Old Church, of wattle-work at first, savoured somewhat of heavenly sanctity, even from its very foundation, and exhaled it over the whole country; claiming superior reverence, though the structure was mean. Hence, here arrived whole tribes of the lower orders, thronging every path; hence assembled the opulent, divested of their pomp; hence it became the crowded residence of the religious and the literary. For, as we have heard from men of elder time, here Gildas,³ an historian neither unlearned nor inelegant, to whom the Britons are indebted for whatever notice they obtain amid other nations, captivated by the sanctity of the place, took up his abode for a series of years. This church, then, is certainly the oldest I am acquainted with in England, and from this circumstance derives its name. In it are preserved the mortal remains of many saints, some of whom we shall notice in our progress; nor is any corner of the church destitute of the ashes of the holy. The very floor, inlaid with polished stone, and the sides of the altar, and even the altar itself above and beneath are laden with the multitude of relics. Moreover, in the pavement may be remarked on every side stones designedly interlaid in triangles and squares, and sealed with lead, under which if I believe some sacred mystery to be contained, I do no injustice to religion. The antiquity, and multitude of its saints, have endued the place with so much sanctity, that at night scarcely any one presumes to keep vigil there, or during the day to void the spittle which may arise: he who is conscious of pollution shudders throughout his whole frame: no one ever brought hawk or horses within the confines of the neighbouring cemetery, who did not depart injured, either in them or in himself. Those persons who, about to undergo the ordeal of fire or water, did there put up their petitions, have in every instance that can be now recollected, except one, exulted in their escape. If any person erected a building in its vicinity, which by its shade obstructed the light of the church, it forthwith became a ruin. And it is sufficiently evident, that the men of that province had no oath more frequent, or more sacred, than to swear by the Old Church, and from fear of swift vengeance avoided nothing so much as perjury in this respect. The truth of what I have asserted, if it be dubious, will be supported by testimony in the book which I have written on the antiquity of the said church, according to the series of years.

² Freulfus, bishop of Lisieux, wrote a chronicle extending from the creation to the time of Boniface, the successor of Gregory the Great. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. 18. He died before A. D. 853.

§ 21. In the meantime it is clear that the depository of so many saints may be deservedly styled an heavenly sanctuary upon earth. There are numbers of documents,—though I abstain from mentioning them for fear of causing weariness,—which prove how extremely venerable this place was held by the chief persons of the country, who there more especially chose to await the day of resurrection under the protection of the mother of God. Willingly would I explain, could I but ascertain the truth, a thing which is almost incomprehensible to all, and that is, the meaning of those pyramids which, situated some few feet from the church, border on the cemetery of the monks. That which is the loftiest and nearest the church, is twenty-eight feet high, and has five stories: this, though threatening ruin from its extreme age, possesses nevertheless some traces of antiquity which may be clearly read, though not perfectly understood. In the highest story is an image, in a pontifical habit. In the next, a statue of regal dignity, and the letters, Her Sexi, and Bliswerh. In the third, too, are the names, Wencrest, Bantomp, Winethegn. In the fourth, Bate, Wulfred, and Eanfled. In the fifth, which is the lowest, there is an image, and the words as follow: Logor, Weaslieas, and Bregden, Swelwes, Hiwingendes Bearn. The other pyramid is twenty-six feet high, and has four stories, in which are read, Centwine,¹ *Hedde*² the bishop, and Bregored and Beorward. The meaning of these I do not hastily decide, but I shrewdly conjecture that within, in stone coffins, are contained the bones of those persons whose names are inscribed without.³ At least Logor is said to imply the person from whom Logweresberh formerly took its name, which is now called Montacute; Bregden, from whom is derived Brentacnol and Brente-meirs; Bregored and Beorward were abbots of that place in the time of the Britons; of whom and of others which occur, I shall henceforward speak more circumstantially. For my history will now proceed to disclose the succession of abbots, and what was bestowed on each monastery, and by what particular king.

§ 22. And first, I shall briefly mention Saint Patrick, with whom the series of our records dawns. While the Saxons were disturbing the peace of the Britons, and the Pelagians assaulting their faith, Saint Germanus of Auxerre¹ assisted them against both; routing the one by the chorus of Halleluah,² and hurling down the other by the thunder of the Evangelists and Apostles. Thence, returning to his own country, he summoned Patrick to become his associate, and after a few years, sent him, at the instance of pope Celestin, to preach to the Irish. Whence it is written in the Chronicles, “In the year of our Lord’s incarnation four hundred and twenty-five,³ Saint Patrick is ordained to Ireland by pope Celestin.” Also, “In the year four hundred and thirty-three Ireland is converted to the faith of Christ by the preaching of St. Patrick, accompanied by many miracles.” He executed his appointed office with diligence, and in his latter days returning to his own country, he landed in Cornwall, from his altar,⁴ which even to this time is held in high veneration by the inhabitants for its sanctity and efficacy in healing the infirm. Proceeding to Glastonbury,⁵ and there becoming monk, and abbot, after some years he paid the debt of nature. All doubt of the truth of this assertion is removed by the vision of a certain brother, who after the saint’s death, when it had frequently become a question, through decay of evidence, whether he really was monk and abbot there, had the fact confirmed by the following oracle. When asleep he seemed to hear some person reading, after many of his miracles, the words which follow:—“This man then was adorned by the sanctity of the metropolitan pall, but afterward was here made monk and abbot.” He added, moreover, as the brother did not give implicit credit to him, that he could show what he had said inscribed in golden letters. Patrick died in the year of his age one hundred and eleven, of our Lord’s incarnation four hundred and seventy-two, being the forty-seventh year after he was sent into Ireland. He lies on the right side of the altar in the old church, within a stone pyramid which the care of posterity has cased in silver. Hence the Irish have an ancient usage of frequenting the place to kiss the relics of their patron.

§ 23. Wherefore the report is extremely prevalent, that both

³ The history of Patrick is exceedingly obscure; this, however, is no place to enter upon an examination of the difficulties which attend it. Malmesbury wrote a life of Patrick in three books, the first and second of which Leland had seen, and from which a few extracts are embodied in his Collectanea, iii. 273, ed. 1770.

St. Indract¹ and St. Brigid, no mean inhabitants of Ireland, formerly came over to this spot. Whether Brigid returned home or died at Glastonbury, is not sufficiently ascertained, though she left here some of her ornaments; that is to say, her necklace, scrip, and implements for embroidering, which are yet shown in memory of her sanctity, and are efficacious in curing various diseases. In the course of my narrative it will appear, that Saint Indract, with seven companions, was martyred near Glastonbury, and afterwards interred in the old church.

§ 24. Benignus² succeeded Patrick in the office of abbot, but for how long remains in doubt. Who he was, and how called in the vernacular tongue, the verses of his epitaph at Ferramere express, not inaptly:—

“Beneath this marble Beonna’s ashes lie,
Once rev’rend abbot of this monastery;
Saint Patrick’s servant, as the Irish frame
The tale, who call him Beon from his name.”

The wonderful works both of his former life, and since his recent translation into the greater church, proclaim the singular grace of God which he anciently possessed, and which he still retains.

§ 25. The esteem in which the great David, archbishop of Menevia, held this place, is too notorious to require repetition. He established the antiquity and sanctity of the church by a divine oracle; for, purposing to dedicate it, he came to the spot with his seven suffragan bishops, and everything being prepared for the due celebration of the solemnity, on the night, as he purposed, preceding it, he gave way to profound repose. When all his senses were steeped in rest, he beheld the Lord Jesus standing near, and mildly inquiring the cause of his arrival; and on his immediately disclosing it, the Lord diverted him from his purpose by saying, that the church had been already dedicated by Himself in honour of his mother, and that the ceremony was not to be profaned by human repetition. With these words He seemed to bore the palm of his hand with his finger, adding, that this was a sign for him not to reiterate what Himself had done before; but that, since his design savoured more of piety than of temerity, his punishment should not be prolonged; and lastly, that on the following morning, when he should repeat the words of the mass, “With Him, and by Him, and in Him,” his health should return to him undiminished. The prelate, awakened by these terrific appearances, as at the moment he grew pale at the sight of the purulent matter, so afterwards he hailed the truth of the prediction. But that he might not appear to have done nothing, he quickly built and dedicated another church. Of this celebrated and incomparable man, I am at a loss to decide, whether he closed his life in this place, or at his own cathedral. For they affirm that he is with St. Patrick; and the Welsh, both by the frequency of their prayers to him and by various reports, without doubt confirm and establish this opinion; openly alleging that bishop Bernard¹ sought for him more than once, notwithstanding much opposition, but was not able to find him. But let thus much suffice of St. David.

§ 26. After a long lapse of time St. Augustine, at the instance of St. Gregory, came into Britain in the year of our Lord's incarnation five hundred and ninety-six, and the tradition of our ancestors has handed down, that the companion of his labours, Paulinus, who was bishop of Rochester after being archbishop of York, covered the church,—built, as we have before observed, with wattle-work,—with a casing of boards. The dexterity of this celebrated man so artfully managed, that nothing of its sanctity should be lost, though much should accrue to its beauty: and certainly the more magnificent the ornaments of churches are, the more they incline the brute mind to prayer, and bend the stubborn to supplication.

§ 27. In the year of our Lord's incarnation six hundred and one, that is, the fifth after the arrival of St. Augustine, the king of Donnonia,² on the petition of abbot Worgrez, granted to the old church which is there situated the land called Ineswitrin, containing five cassates.³ "I, Maworn, bishop, wrote this grant. I, Worgrez, abbot of the place, signed it."

§ 28. Who this king might be, the antiquity of the instrument prevents our knowing. But that he was a Briton cannot be doubted, because he called Glastonbury Ineswitrin, in his vernacular tongue; and that in the British it is so called, is well known. Moreover it is proper to remark the extreme antiquity of a church, which, even then, was called the "old church." In addition to Worgrez, Lademund and Bregored, whose very names imply British barbarism, were abbots of this place. The periods of their presiding are uncertain, but their names and dignities are indicated by a painting in the larger church, near the altar. Blessed, therefore, are the inhabitants of this place, allured to uprightness of life by reverence for such a sanctuary. I cannot suppose that any of these, when dead, can fail of winning heaven, when assisted by the virtues and intercession of so many patrons.

§ 29. In the year of our Lord's incarnation six hundred and seventy, and the twenty-ninth of his reign, Ceonwath gave⁴ to Bertwald, abbot of Glastonbury, two hides of land, at the request of archbishop Theodore. The same Bertwald, against the will of the king and of the bishop of the diocese, relinquishing Glastonbury, went to govern the monastery of Reculver. In consequence, Bertwald, equally renowned for piety and high birth, (being son of a brother of Æthelred, king of the Mercians,) and residing in the vicinity of Canterbury, on the demise of archbishop Theodore, succeeded¹ to his see. This may be sufficient for me to have inserted on the antiquity of the church of Glastonbury.² Now I shall return in course to Kenewalch, who was so munificent, that he denied no part of his patrimony to his relations, and with noble generosity conferred nearly the third part of his kingdom on his brother's son.³ These princely qualities were stimulated by the admonitions of those holy bishops of his province, Angilbert, of whom you will find many commendable things in the History of the Angles,⁴ and his nephew Leutherius, who after him was for seven years bishop of the West Saxons: this circumstance I have thought proper to mention, because Beda has left no account of the duration of his episcopate,⁵ and to disguise a fact which I learn from the Chronicles,⁶ would be against my conscience; besides, it affords an opportunity which ought to be embraced, of making mention of a distinguished man, who by a clear and divinely inspired mind advanced the monastery of Malmesbury, where I carry on my earthly warfare, to the highest pitch. This monastery was so slenderly endowed by Meildulf,⁷ a Scot, as they say, by nation, a philosopher by erudition, a monk by profession, that its members could scarcely procure their daily subsistence; but Leutherius, after long and due deliberation, gave it to Aldelm, a monk of the same place, to be by him governed with the authority then possessed by bishops. Of which matter, that my relation may obviate every doubt, I shall subjoin his own words.

§ 30. "I, Leutherius, by divine permission bishop supreme of the Saxon see,⁸ am requested by the abbots who, within the jurisdiction of our diocese, preside over the conventual assemblies of monks with pastoral anxiety, to give and to grant that portion of land called Meildulfesburh⁹ to Aldelm the priest, for the purpose of leading a life according to strict rule: in which place, indeed, from his earliest infancy and first initiation in the study of learning, he has been instructed in the liberal arts, and passed his days, nurtured in the bosom of the holy mother church; and on which account fraternal love appears principally to have conceived this request: wherefore assenting to the petition of the aforesaid abbots, I willingly grant that place to him and his successors, who shall sedulously follow the laws of the holy institution. Done publicly near the river Bladon,¹⁰ this seventh of the kalends of September, in the year of our Lord's incarnation six hundred and seventy-two."¹¹

to flourish exceedingly; then monks assembled on all sides; there was a general concourse to Aldelm; some admiring the sanctity of his life, others the depth of his learning. For he was a man as unsophisticated in religion as multifarious in knowledge; whose piety surpassed even his reputation: and he had so fully imbibed the liberal arts, that he was wonderful in each of them, and unrivalled in all. I greatly err, if his works written on the subject of Virginity,¹ than which, in my opinion, nothing can be more pleasing or more splendid, are not proofs of his immortal genius: although, such is the slothfulness of our times, they may excite disgust in some persons, not duly considering how modes of expression differ according to the customs of nations. The Greeks, for instance, express themselves involvedly, the Romans clearly, the Gauls gorgeously, the Angles turgidly. And truly, as it is pleasant to dwell on the graces of our ancestors and to animate our minds by their example, I would here, most willingly, unfold what painful labours this holy man encountered for the privileges of our church, and with what miracles he signalized his life, did not my avocations lead me elsewhere; and his noble acts appear clearer even to the eye of the purblind, than they can possibly be sketched by my pencil.² The innumerable miracles which at this time take place at his tomb manifest to the present race the sanctity of the life he passed. He has therefore his proper praise; he has the fame acquired by his merits: my history pursues its course.

§ 32. After thirty-one years, Kenwalk dying,³ bequeathed the administration of the government to his wife Sexburga; nor did this woman want spirit for discharging the duties of the station; she levied new forces, preserved the old in their duty; ruled her subjects with moderation, and overawed her enemies: in short, she conducted all things in such a manner, that no difference was discoverable except that of sex: but breathing more than female spirit, she died, having scarcely reigned a year.

§ 33. Escuin⁴ passed the next two years in the government; a near relation of the royal family, being grand-nephew to Cinegisl, by his brother Cuthgisl; at whose death, either natural or violent, (for I cannot exactly find which,) Chentwin,⁵ the son of Chinegisl, filled the vacant throne in legitimate succession. Both were men of noted experience in war; as the one routed the Mercians,⁶ the other the Britons,⁷ with dreadful slaughter: but they were to be pitied for the shortness of their career; the reign of the latter not extending beyond nine, nor of the former more than two years, as I have already related. This is on the credit of the Chronicles: however, Beda¹ records that they did not reign successively, but divided the kingdom between them.

§ 34. Next sprang forth a noble branch of the royal stock, Kedwalla,² grand-nephew of Cheaulin, by his brother Cuda; a youth of unbounded promise, who allowed no opportunity of exercising his valour to escape him. He, having long before, by his active exertions, excited the animosity of the princes of his country, was, by a conspiracy, driven into exile.³ Taking advantage of this outrage, as the means of depriving the province of its warlike force, he led away all the military population with him; for whether out of pity to his broken fortunes, or regard for his valour, the whole of the youth accompanied him into exile. Edelwalch,⁴ king of the South Saxons, hazarding an engagement with him, felt the first effect of his fury: for being routed with all the forces which he had collected, he, too late, repented his rash design. The spirits of his followers being thus elated, Chedwalla, by a sudden and unexpected return, drove the rivals of his power from the kingdom. Enjoying his government for the space of two years, he performed many signal exploits: hostile towards the South Saxons with inextinguishable hatred, he totally destroyed Edric, the successor of Edelwalch, who opposed him with renewed boldness. He all but depopulated the Isle of Wight, which had rebelled in confederacy with the Mercians. He also attacked the people of Kent and gained repeated victories over them. Finally, as is observed above,⁵ he retired from that province, on the death of his brother, compensating his loss by the blood of many of its inhabitants. It is difficult to relate how extremely pious he was even before his baptism, insomuch that he dedicated to God the tenth of all the spoils which he had acquired in war. In which, though we approve the intention, we condemn the example; according to the saying:⁶ "He who offers sacrifice from the substance of a poor man, is like him who immolates the son in the sight of the father." That he went to Rome to be baptized⁷ by pope Sergius, and was called Peter, and that he yielded joyfully to the will of heaven, while yet in his white baptismal robes,⁸ are matters too well known to require our illustration.

§ 35. After his departure to Rome, the government was assumed by Ina,⁹ grand-nephew of Chinegisl by his brother Cuthbald, who ascended the throne, more from the innate activity of his spirit, than by any legitimate right of succession; he was a rare example of fortitude; a mirror of prudence; unequalled in piety: thus regulating his life, he gained favour at home, and respect abroad. Safe from any apprehensions of treachery, he grew old in the discharge of his duties for thirty-eight years,¹ the pious conciliator of the public esteem. His first expedition was against the people of Kent, as the indignation at their burning Mollo² had not yet subsided. The inhabitants resisted awhile; but soon finding all their attempts and endeavours fail, and seeing nothing in the disposition of Ina which could lead them to suppose he would remit his exertions, they were induced, by the consideration of their losses, to treat of a surrender: they tempt the royal mind with presents, lure him with promises, and bargain for a peace for thirty thousand mancas³ of gold, that, softened by so high a price, he should put an end to the war, and, being thus bound in golden chains, sound a retreat. Accepting the money, as a sufficient atonement for their offence, he returned into his kingdom. And not only the people of Kent, but the East Angles also, felt the effects of his hereditary anger; all their nobility being first expelled, and afterwards routed in battle. But let the relation of his military successes here find a termination. Moreover how sedulous he was in religious matters, the laws⁴ he enacted to reform the manners of the people are proof sufficient; in which the image of his purity is reflected even upon the present times. Another proof are the monasteries nobly founded at the king's expense,⁵ more especially

³ The manca and the ancient marca are by some thought to be synonymous, and to be money, either gold or silver, which was paid in weight. The value of the manca of gold is not exactly known; it is believed to be eight to the pound. The manca of silver in the time of Henry I. was estimated at six shillings, five pence to the shilling; and in the reign of Edward III. at only thirty pence of the money of that period. According to the Saxon Chronicle, Ine received thirty thousand pounds from the Kentishmen, because they had formerly burned Mull. This payment seems excessive; but it was probably the legal compensation for the death of Mull. Ethelward says it was "30,000 solidi per singulos constanti numero sexdecim nummis;" and Florence of Worcester, three thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds.

⁴ The laws of Ine may be seen in Thorpe's edition, i. 102.

⁵ After "expense" A. L. G. and some other MSS. with slight variations read, "More especially that at Glastonbury, most celebrated in our days, which he erected, in a certain washy corner, in order that the monks might more eagerly thirst after heavenly, in proportion as they were less affected by earthly things. Father Aldelm assisted the design, whose precepts, in this respect, he heard with humility, nobly adopted, and joyfully carried into effect. Lastly, he readily confirmed the privilege which Aldelm had obtained from pope Sergius, for the immunity of his monasteries; gave much to the servants of God by his advice, and finally honoured him (though he constantly refused it) with a bishopric; but an early death malignantly cut off this great man from the world, for scarcely had he discharged the offices of his bishopric four years, ere he made his soul an offering to heaven, in the year of our Lord's incarnation 709 [on the vigil of St. Augustine the apostle of the Angles, the 8th of the kalends of June (25th May).] Some say that he was the nephew of the king, by his brother Kenten; but I do not choose to assert for truth anything which savours rather of vague opinion, than of historic credibility; especially as I can find no ancient record of it, and the Chronicle clearly declares, that Ina had no other brother than Inigeld, who died some few years before him. Aldelm needs no support from fiction; such great things are there concerning him of indisputable truth, so many which are beyond the reach of doubt. The sisters indeed of Ina, were Cuthburga and Quenburga: Cuthburga was given in marriage to Alfrid, king of the Northumbrians, but the contract being soon after dissolved, she led a life dedicated to Glastonbury, whither he ordered to be conveyed the bodies of the blessed martyr Indract and of his associates, after having taken them from the place of their martyrdom. The body of St. Indract he deposited in the stone pyramid on the left side of the altar, where the zeal of posterity afterwards also placed the blessed Hilda :¹ the others he distributed beneath the pavement as chance directed or regard might suggest. Here, too, he erected a church, dedicated to the holy apostles, as an appendage to the ancient church of which we are speaking ; enriched it with vast possessions, and granted it a privilege in these words :—

§ 36. “In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ ; I, Ina, supported in my royal dignity by God, with the advice of my queen Sexburga, and the permission of Beortwald archbishop of Canterbury, and of all his suffragans ; and also at the instance of the princes Baldred and Adelard, to the ancient church, situate in the place called Glastonbury (which church the great High Priest and chiefest Minister formerly through his own ministry, and that of angels, sanctified by many and unheard-of miracles to Himself and the ever-virgin Mary, as was formerly revealed² to St. David,) do grant out of those places which I possess by paternal inheritance, God, first at Berking, under the abess Hildelida, and afterwards, as superior of the convent at Wimburn ; now a mean village, but formerly celebrated for containing a full company of virgins, who, dead to earthly desires, breathed only heavenly affections. She embraced the profession of holy celibacy from the perusal of Aldelm's books on Virginitv, dedicated indeed to the sisterhood of Berking, but profitable to all who aspire to that state. Ina's queen was Ethelburga, a woman of royal race and disposition ; who perpetually urging the necessity of bidding adieu to earthly things, at least in the close of life, and the king as constantly deferring the execution of her advice, at last she endeavoured to overcome him by a stratagem. For on a certain occasion, when they had been reveling at a country seat with riot and luxury, the next day, after their departure, an attendant, with the privy of the queen, defiled the palace in every possible manner, both with the excrement of cattle and heaps of filth ; and lastly he put a sow, which had recently farrowed, in the very bed where they had lain. They had hardly proceeded a mile, ere she attacked her husband with the fondest conjugal endearments, entreating that they might immediately return thither, whence they had departed, saying, that his denial would be attended with dangerous consequences. Her petition being readily granted, the king was astonished at seeing a place which yesterday might have vied with the luxury of Sardanapalus, now filthily disgusting and desolate ; and silently pondering on the sight, his eyes at length turned upon the queen. Seizing the opportunity, and pleasantly smiling, ‘Where, my noble spouse,’ said she, ‘are the revellings of yesterday ? Where the tapestries dipped in Sidonian dyes ? Where the ceaseless impertinence of parasites ? Where the sculptured vessels, overwhelming the very tables with their weight of gold ? Where are the delicacies so anxiously sought throughout sea and land, to pamper the appetite ? Are not all these things smoke and vapour ? Have they not all passed away ? Woe be to those who attach themselves to such, for they in like manner shall consume away. Are not all these like a rapid river hastening to the sea ? And woe to those who are attached to them, for they shall be carried away by the current. Reflect, I entreat you, how wretchedly will these bodies decay, which are now pampered with luxury. Must not we, who gorge so constantly, become more disgustingly putrid ? The mighty must undergo mightier torments, and a severer trial awaits the strong.’ Without saying more, by this striking example, she gained over her husband to those sentiments, which she had in vain attempted for years by persuasion.” and hold in my demesne, they being adjacent and fitting for the purpose, for the maintenance of the monastic institution, and the use of the monks, Brente ten hides, Seweie ten hides, Piltun twenty hides, Dulting twenty hides, Bledanhide one hide, together with whatever my predecessors have contributed to the same church: to wit, Chenewalch,¹ who, at the instance of archbishop Theodore, gave Ferremere, Bregereie, Coneneie, Matineseie, Ederedseie; Chentwin, who used to call Glastonbury 'the mother of saints,' and liberated it from every secular and ecclesiastical service, and granted it this dignified privilege, that the brethren of that place should have the power of electing and appointing their ruler, according to the rule of St. Benedict: Hedde² the bishop, (who, with permission of Chedwalla, though an heathen, confirmed it with his own hand, gave Lantocai; Baldred, who gave Pennard, six hides; Adelard, who contributed Poelt,³ sixty hides; I permitting and confirming it. To the piety and affectionate entreaty of these people I assent, and I guard by the security of my royal grant against the designs of malignant men and snarling curs, in order that the church of our Lord Jesus Christ and the ever-virgin Mary, as it is the first in the kingdom of Britain, and the source and fountain of all religion, may obtain surpassing dignity and privilege, and, as she rules over choirs of angels in heaven, so it may never pay servile obedience to men on earth. Wherefore the chief pontiff Gregory⁴ assenting, and taking the mother of his Lord, and me (however unworthy) together with her, into the bosom and protection of the holy Roman church; and all the kings, archbishops, bishops, dukes, and abbots of Britain consenting, I appoint and establish, that all lands, places and possessions of St. Mary of Glastonbury be and remain free, quiet, and undisturbed, from all royal taxes and works, which are wont to be appointed, that is to say, expeditions, the building of bridges and forts, and from the edicts and molestations of all archbishops and bishops, as is found to be confirmed and granted by my predecessors, Chenewalch, Chentwin, Chedwalla, and Baltred, in the ancient charters of the same church. And whatsoever questions shall arise, whether of homicide, sacrilege, poison, theft, rapine, the disposal and limits of churches, the ordination of clerks, ecclesiastical synods, and all judicial inquiries, they shall be determined by the decision of the abbot and convent, without the interference of any person whatsoever. Moreover I command all princes, archbishops, bishops, dukes, and governors of my kingdom, as they regard their own honour and my esteem, and all dependants, mine as well as theirs, as they value their personal safety, never to dare to enter the island of our Lord Jesus Christ and of the ever-virgin Mary, at Glastonbury, nor the possessions of the said church, for the purpose of holding courts, making inquiry, or seizing, or doing anything whatever to the offence of the servants of God there residing. Moreover I particularly inhibit by the curse of Almighty God, of the ever-virgin Mary, and of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and of the rest of the saints, any bishop on any account whatever from presuming to take his episcopal seat, or to celebrate divine service, or consecrate altars, or dedicate churches, or ordain, or do anything whatsoever, either in the church of Glastonbury itself, or its dependent churches, that is to say, Soweie, Brente, Merlinch, Sapwic, Stret, Budecalech, Piltun, or in their chapels, or in the islands, unless he be specially invited by the abbot or brethren of that place. But if he come upon such invitation, he shall take nothing to himself of the things of the church, nor of the offerings; knowing that he has two mansions appointed him in two several places out of this church's possessions, one in Piltun,¹ the other in the vill called Poelt,² that, when coming or going, he may have a place of entertainment. Nor even shall it be lawful for him to pass the night here unless he shall be detained by stress of weather or bodily sickness, or invited by the abbot or monks, and then with not more than three or four clerks. Moreover let the aforesaid bishop be mindful every year, with his clerks that are at Wells,³ to acknowledge his mother church of Glastonbury with litanies on the second day after our Lord's Ascension. And should he haughtily defer so doing, or fail in the things which are above recited and confirmed, he shall forfeit his mansions above mentioned. The abbot or monks shall direct whom they please, so that he celebrate Easter canonically, to perform service in the church of Glastonbury, its dependent churches, and in their chapels. Whosoever, be he of what dignity, profession, or degree he may, shall hereafter on any occasion whatsoever attempt to pervert or nullify this instrument, the witness of my munificence and liberality, let him be aware that, with the traitor Judas, he shall perish, to his eternal confusion, in the devouring flames of unspeakable torments.

§ 37. For⁵ after his triumphal spoils in war, after many successive degrees in virtue, he aspired to the highest perfection, and went to Rome⁶ in the year of our Lord's incarnation seven hundred and twenty-six. There, not to make the glory of his conversion public, he was shorn in secret, and, clad in homely garb, that he might be acceptable in the sight of God alone, grew old in privacy. Nor did his queen, the author of this noble deed, desert him, but as she had before incited him to undertake it, so, afterwards, she made it her constant care to soothe his sorrows by her conversation, to stimulate him when wavering by her example; in short, to omit nothing that could be conducive to his salvation. Thus united in mutual affection, in due time they trod the common path of all mankind. This was attended, as we have heard, with singular miracles, such as God often deigns to bestow on the virtues of happy couples.

§ 38. To the government succeeded Edeldard,¹ the kinsman of Ina; though Oswald,² a youth of royal extraction, often obscured his opening prospects. Exciting his countrymen to rebellion, he attempted to make war on the king, but soon after perishing by some unhappy doom, Edeldard kept quiet possession of the kingdom for fourteen years, and then left it to his kinsman Cudred, who for an equal space of time, and with similar courage, was ever actively employed. He conferred many benefits on the church of Glastonbury, and gave it a charter in these words:—

§ 39. “³In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. All the possessions granted by former kings, to wit, Chentwin, Baldred, Chedwalla, Ine, Ethelard, and Ethbald king of the Mercians, in vills, streets, fields, farms, and manors, I Cudred, king of the West Saxons, do by this instrument marked with my own hand with the sign of the cross confirm, in the same manner as the ancient city was confirmed to Glastonbury: and do decree that the said grants of preceding kings shall remain fast and lasting as long as the revolving pole shall in its steady course turn the heavens round sea and land. But if any one swollen with tyrannical insolence shall at any time attempt to diminish or make void this my grant, may he, when dead, at the judgment be winnowed away from the congregation of the saints, and, mixed with the herd of the spoilers, for ever pay the penalty of his wicked rashness. But whoever with kind intent shall endeavour to advance, strengthen, and uphold it, may he obtain his desires, and hear for ever the glories of the Most High, in the joyful company of angels and all saints.

“This charter was made and delivered in the aforesaid monastery in the presence of Cuthred the king, who laid it with his princely hand on the altar, in the wooden church in which the brethren of abbot Hemgisl are buried, in the year⁴ of our Lord’s incarnation seven hundred and forty-five.”

§ 40. The said Cuthred exerted himself greatly against, and after frequent efforts he obtained victories over, Athelbald,⁵ king of the Mercians, and over the Britons, and after fourteen years he laid down the reins of government.

§ 41. Sigebert¹ then seized on the kingdom; a man of inhuman cruelty among his own subjects, and noted for excessive cowardice abroad; but the common detestation of all men conspiring against him, he was driven from the throne in a twelvemonth, and gave place to one more worthy than himself. Yet, as commonly happens in similar cases, the severity of his misfortunes brought back some persons to embrace his cause, and the province which is called Hamtunsceire [Hampshire] was by their exertions retained in subjection to him. Still, however, unable to quit his former habits, and exciting the enmity of all against him by the murder of one Cumbrand, who had adhered to him with unshaken fidelity, he fled to the recesses of wild beasts, where, misfortune still attending him, he was stabbed to death by a swineherd.² Thus the cruelty of a king, which had almost desolated the higher ranks, was put an end to by a man of the lowest condition.³

§ 42. Kynuulf⁴ next undertook the guidance of the state. Illustrious for the exact regulation of his conduct, and his deeds in arms, but suffering extremely from the loss of a single battle, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, against Offa king of the Mercians, near Bensigitune,⁵ he was also finally doomed to a disgraceful death. For after he had reigned thirty-one years,⁶ neither indolently nor oppressively, becoming either elated with success, because he imagined nothing could oppose him, or alarmed for his posterity, from the increasing power of Kineard, the brother of Sigebert, he compelled him to quit the kingdom. Kineard, deeming it necessary to yield to the emergency of the times, departed as if voluntarily; but soon after, when by secret meetings he had assembled a desperate band of wretches, watching when the king might be alone (for he had gone into the country for the sake of recreation), he followed him thither with his party, and learning that he was there giving loose to improper amours, he beset the house on all sides. The king, struck with his perilous situation, and holding a conference with the persons present, shut fast the doors, expecting either to appease the robbers by fair language, or to terrify them by threats. When neither plan succeeded, he rushed furiously on Kineard, and had nearly killed him; but, surrounded by the multitude, and thinking it derogatory to his courage to give way, he fell, while nobly avenging his death. Some few of his attendants, who, instead of yielding, attempted to take vengeance for the loss of their lord, were slain. The report of this dreadful outrage soon reached the ears of the nobles, who were waiting near at hand. Of these Osric, the chief in age and prudence, exhorting the rest not to leave unrevenge'd the death of their sovereign to their own signal and eternal ignominy, rushed with drawn sword upon the conspirators. At first Kineard attempted to argue his case, to make tempting offers, to hold forth their relationship; but when this availed nothing, he stimulated his party to resistance. Doubtful was the conflict, where one side contended with all its powers for life, the other for glory; at length victory, wavering for a long time, decided for the juster cause. Thus, fruitlessly valiant, this unhappy man lost his life, unable long to boast the success of his treachery. The king's body was buried at Winchester, and the prince's at Respendun,¹ at that time a noble monastery, but at present, as I have heard, with few or scarcely any inmates.

§ 43. After him, for sixteen years, reigned Brictric;² more studious of peace than of war, skilful in conciliating friendship, affable with foreigners, and giving great allowance to his subjects in those matters at least which could not impair the strength of the government. To acquire still greater estimation with his neighbours, he married³ the daughter of Offa king of Mercia, at that time all-powerful, by whom, as far as I am acquainted, he had no issue. Supported by this alliance he compelled Egbirt, the sole survivor of the royal stock, and whom he feared as the most effectual obstacle to his power, to fly into France. In fact Brictric himself, and the other kings after Ina, though glorying in the splendour of their parentage, as deriving their origin from Cerdic, had considerably deviated from the direct line of the royal race. On Egbirt's expulsion, then, he had already begun to indulge in indolent security, when a piratical tribe of Danes,⁴ accustomed to live by plunder, clandestinely arriving in three ships, disturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom. This band came over expressly to ascertain the fruitfulness of the soil, and the courage of the inhabitants, as was afterwards discovered by the arrival of that multitude which overran almost the whole of Britain. Landing then, unexpectedly, when the kingdom was in a state of profound peace, they seized upon a royal vill which was nearest them, and killed the steward, who had advanced with succours; but losing their booty through fear of the people, who hastened to attack them, they retired to their ships. After Brictric,⁵ who was buried at Werram, Egbert ascended the throne of his ancestors; justly to be preferred to all the kings who preceded him. Thus having brought down our narrative to his times, we must, as we have promised, next give our attention to the Northumbrians.

³ Beorhtric married Eadburh, king Offa's daughter, in 787. See the Saxon Chronicle, and Florence of Worcester, A. D. 787.

⁴ See the authorities last quoted.

Of the Kingdom of the Northumbrians.

§ 44. We have before related briefly,¹ and now necessarily repeat, that Hengest, having settled his own government in Kent, had sent his brother Ohta and his son Ebusa, men of activity and tried experience, to seize on the northern parts of Britain. Sedulous in executing the command, affairs succeeded to their wishes: for frequently coming into action with the inhabitants, and dispersing those who attempted resistance, they conciliated with uninterrupted quiet such as submitted. Thus though, through their own address and the good-will of their followers, they had established a certain degree of power, yet never entertaining an idea of assuming the royal title, they left an example of similar moderation to their immediate posterity. For during the space of ninety-nine years,² the Northumbrian leaders, contented with subordinate power, lived in subjection to the kings of Kent. Afterwards, however, this forbearance ceased, either because the human mind is ever prone to degeneracy, or because that race of people was naturally ambitious. In the year, therefore, of our Lord's incarnation five hundred and forty-seven, the sixtieth after Hengest's death, the principality was converted into a kingdom, and the most noble Ida,³ in the full vigour of life and of strength, first reigned there. But whether he himself seized the chief authority, or received it by the consent of others, I by no means venture to determine, because the truth is unrevealed: however, it is sufficiently evident, that, sprung from a great and ancient lineage, he reflected much splendour on his illustrious descent by his pure and unsullied manners. Unconquered in war, at home he tempered his kingly power with peculiar affability. Of this man, and of others in their respective places, I could lineally trace the descent, were it not that the very names, of uncouth sound, would be less agreeable to my readers than I could wish. It may, however, be proper to remark, that Woden had three sons: Weldeg, Wiltheg, and Beldeg. From the first, the kings of Kent derived their origin; from the second, the kings of Mercia; and from the third, the kings of the West Saxons and Northumbrians, with the exception of the two whom I am going to particularise. This Ida, then, the ninth from Beldeg, and the tenth from Woden, as I find positively declared, continued in the government fourteen years.⁴

² Malmesbury's authority for this statement cannot be traced.

³ Prior to the accession of Ida, the Saxon Chronicle contains no notice of Northumbria. That authority, however, and Beda, (E. H. § 452,) both consider Ida the founder of this kingdom in 547. It seems doubtful whether Ida was king of both the provinces of Bernicia and Deira, or of the former only. Upon his death in 559, he was succeeded in Bernicia by his sons, who reigned successively till the year 588, when Aethelric, upon the death of Alla, king of Bernicia, and the expulsion of his son Edwin, obtained the government of both kingdoms, which he held for five years, until his death in 593. Compare the statements of Florence of Worcester, A. D. 559, and the Appendix to that writer, p. 397, with the statements of Simeon of Durham upon this subject.

§ 45. His successor Alla,¹ originating from the same stock, but descending from Woden by a different branch, conducted the government, extended by his exertions considerably beyond its former bounds, for thirty years. In his time youths from Northumbria were exposed to sale, after the common and almost native custom of this people;² so that even, as our days have witnessed, they would make no scruple of separating the nearest ties of relationship through the temptation of the slightest advantage. Some of these youths, then, carried from England³ for sale to Rome, became the means of salvation to all their countrymen; for exciting the attention of that city by the beauty of their countenances and the elegance of their features, it happened that, among others, the most blessed Gregory, at that time archdeacon of the apostolical see, was present, who, admiring such an assemblage of grace in mortals, and at the same time pitying their abject condition as captives, asked the by-standers, "Of what race are these? whence come they?" He was answered, "By birth they are Angles; by country, Deiri⁴ (Deira being a province of Northumbria); they are subjects of king Alla, and are Pagans." Their concluding characteristic he accompanied with heartfelt sighs; to the others he elegantly alluded, saying that "these Angles, angel-like, should be delivered from ire, and taught to sing Alleluia." Obtaining permission without delay from pope Benedict,⁵ the industry of this excellent man was all alive to enter on the journey to convert them; and certainly his zeal would have completed this intended labour, had not the mutinous love of his fellow-citizens recalled him when he was already on his progress. He was a man as celebrated for his virtues as beloved by his countrymen; for by his matchless worth he had even exceeded the expectations which they had formed of him from his youth. His good intention, though frustrated at this time, received afterwards, during his pontificate,⁶ an honourable termination, as the reader will find in its proper place. I have made this insertion with pleasure, that my readers might not lose this notice of Alla, mention of whom is slightly made in the life of pope Gregory; for although this king was the primary cause of introducing Christianity among the Angles, yet either by the counsel of God, or some mischance, was never himself permitted to know it. The calling, indeed, descended to his son.

³ Compare this story with Beda (E. H. ii. 1, § 89), who relates it as merely traditional.

⁶ Gregory the Great presided from 3d Sept. A. D. 590, to 12th March, A. D. 604.

§ 46. On the death of Alla,¹ Ethelric² the son of Ida, advanced to extreme old age, after a life consumed in penury, obtained the kingdom, and after five years was taken off by a sudden death. He was a pitiable prince, whom fame would have hidden in obscurity, had not the conspicuous energy of the son lifted up the father into notice.

§ 47. When therefore, by a long old age, he had satisfied the desire of life, Ethelfrid,³ the elder of his sons, ascended the throne, and compensated the greenness of his years by the maturity of his conduct. His transactions have been so displayed by graceful composition, that they want no assistance of mine, except as far as order is concerned. So eagerly has Beda⁴ dwelt on the praises of this man and his successors, and has dilated on his neighbours the Northumbrians at greater length, being better acquainted with them because of their proximity; our history, therefore, will select and compile from his relation. In order, however, that no one may blame me for contracting so diffuse a narrative, I must tell him that I have done it purposely, that they who have been nauseated with such high-seasoned delicacies, may find breathing space for a little while on these humble remnants; for it is a trite saying, and venerable for its age, that "The meats which cloy the least, are eaten with keenest appetite." Ethelfrid then, as I was relating, having obtained the kingdom, began at first vigorously to defend his own territories; afterwards, eagerly to invade those of his neighbours, and to seek occasion for signaling himself on all sides. Many wars were begun by him with foresight, and terminated with success; as he was neither restrained from duty by indolence, nor precipitated into rashness by courage. An evidence of these things is Degstan,⁵ a noted place in those parts, where Edan, king of the Scots, envying Ethelfrid's successes, had constrained him, though averse, to give battle; but being overcome, he took to flight, though the triumph was not obtained without considerable hazard to the victor: for Tetbald, the brother of Ethelfrid, opposing himself to the most imminent dangers, that he might display his zeal in his brother's cause, left a mournful victory indeed, being cut off with his whole party. Another proof of his success is afforded by the city of Caerleon,⁶ now simply called Chester, which till that period, possessed by the Britons, fostered the pride of a people hostile to the king. When he bent his exertions to subdue this city, the townsmen preferring any extremity to a siege, and at the same time confiding in their numbers, rushed out in multitudes to battle; but deceived by a stratagem, they were overcome and put to flight; his fury being first⁷ vented on the monks, who came out in numbers to pray for the safety of the army.⁸ That their number was incredible to these times, is apparent from so many half-destroyed walls of churches in the neighbouring monastery; so many winding porticoes; such masses of ruins as can scarcely be seen elsewhere. The place is called Bangor, at that day a noted monastery, but now changed into a cathedral.¹ Ethelfrid thus, while circumstances proceeded to his wishes abroad, being desirous of warding off domestic apprehensions and intestine danger, banished Edwin,² the son of Alla, a youth of no mean worth, from his kingdom and country. He, wandering for a long time without any settled habitation, found many of his former friends more inclined to his enemy than to the observance of their engagements; for as it is said,³

“So long as fortune smiles, thy friends abound:
Change but the season, and alone thou’rt found.”

At last he came to Redwald, king of the East Angles, and bemoaning his misfortunes, was received into his protection. Shortly after there came messengers from Ethelfrid, either demanding the surrender of the fugitive, or denouncing hostilities. Determined by the advice of his wife not to violate, through intimidation of any one, the faith which he had pledged to his friend, Redwald collected a body of troops, rushed against Ethelfrid,⁴ and attacked him suddenly, while suspecting nothing less than an assault. He availed himself of the only remedy that courage, thus taken by surprise, could suggest, there being no time to escape. Wherefore, though almost totally unarmed, though beset with fearful danger on every side, he fell not till he had avenged his own death by the destruction of Reiner, the son of Redwald. Such an end had Ethelfrid, after a reign of twenty-four years;⁵ a man second to none in martial experience, but entirely ignorant of the holy faith. He had two sons⁶ by Acca, the daughter of Alla, sister of Edwin; Oswald, aged twelve, and Oswiu, four years; who, on the death of their father, fled, through the management of those who had the charge of them, and escaped into Scotland.

thither to pray for the Welsh army. The exact date of this massacre is not known. There is no date assigned to this event in Beda. Florence places it in the year 603; the Annales Cambriæ in 613; the Saxon Chronicle in 607. Ussher, following the Ulster Annals, refers it to the year 613.

⁴ Aethelfrith was slain A. D. 617, in a battle with Redwald, near Retford, on the river Idle, in Nottinghamshire. (Sax. Chronicle, A. D. 617; Flor. of Worcester, A. D. 616; and Henry of Huntingdon.)

Concerning Edwin, the King of the Northumbrians.

§ 48. In this manner, all his rivals being slain or banished, Edwin,¹ trained by many adversities, ascended, not meanly qualified, the summit of power. When the haughtiness of the Northumbrians had bent to his dominion, his felicity was crowned by the timely death of Redwald, whose subjects, during Edwin's exile among them, having formerly experienced his ready courage and ardent disposition, now willingly swore obedience to him. Granting to the son of Redwald the empty title of king, he himself managed all things as he thought fit. At this juncture, the hopes and the resources of the Angles were centered in him; nor was there a single province of Britain which did not regard his will, and prepare to obey it, except Kent alone: for he had left these people free from his incursions, because he had long meditated a marriage with Ethelburga,² the sister of their king Edbald. When she was granted to him, after a courtship long protracted,—to the intent that he should not despise that woman when possessed, whom he so ardently desired when withheld,—these two kingdoms became so united by the ties of kindred, that there was no rivalry in their powers, no difference in their manners. Moreover, on this occasion the faith of Christ our Lord, introduced into those parts by the preaching of Paulinus,³ reached first the king himself;⁴ the queen, among other proofs of conjugal affection, perpetually instructing him in it; nor was the admonition of the bishop wanting in its own place. For a long time he was wavering and doubtful; but once received, he thoroughly imbibed it. Then he invited neighbouring kings to the faith; then he erected churches; and neglected nothing that might aid its propagation. In the meanwhile, the merciful grace of God smiled on the devotion of the king, insomuch that not only the nations of Britain, that is to say, the Angles, Scots, and Picts, but even the Orkney isles and the isles of Mevania, which they now call Anglesey, that is, islands of the Angles, both feared his arms and venerated his power. At that time there was no public robber, no domestic thief; the tempter of conjugal fidelity was far distant, the plunderer of another man's inheritance was in exile; a state of things redounding to his praise, and worthy of celebration in our times. In short, such was the increase of his power, that righteousness and peace willingly met and kissed each other, imparting mutual acts of kindness. And now, indeed, would the government of the Angles have held a prosperous course, had not an untimely death, the stepmother of all earthly felicity, by a lamentable turn of fortune, snatched this man from his country; for in the forty-eighth year of his age, and the seventeenth of his reign, being killed, together with his son,¹ by the princes whom he had formerly subjugated, Chedwalla of the Britons and Penda of the Mercians, rising up against him, he became a melancholy example of human vicissitude. He was inferior to none in prudence: for he would not embrace even the Christian faith till he had examined it most carefully; but when once adopted, he esteemed nothing worthy to be compared to it.

Concerning S. Oswald the King.

§ 49. Edwin thus slain, the sons of Ethelfrid, who were also the nephews of Edwin,² Oswald and Oswiu, now grown up, and in the budding prime of youth, resought their country, together with Eanfrid,³ their elder brother, whom I forgot before to mention. The kingdom therefore was now divided into two. Indeed Northumbria, long since separated into two provinces, had produced Alla, king of the Deirans, and Ida, of the Bernicians. Wherefore Osric, the cousin of Eadwin, succeeding to Deira, and Eanfrid, the son of Ethelfrid, to Bernicia,⁴ they exulted in the recovery of their hereditary right. They had both been baptized in Scotland, though scarcely were they settled in their authority, ere they renounced their faith: but shortly after they suffered the just penalty of their apostasy through the hostility of Chedwalla.⁵ The space of a year passed in these transactions improved Oswald,⁶ a young man of great hope, in the science of government. Armed rather by his faith (for he had been admitted to baptism while in exile with many nobles among the Scots) than by his military preparations, at the first onset he drove Chedwalla, a man elated with the recollection of his former deeds, and, as he used himself to say, born for the extermination of the Angles, from his camp, and afterwards destroyed him with all his forces.⁷ For when he had collected the little army which he was able to muster, he excited them to the conflict by saying that, laying aside all thought of flight, they must determine either to conquer or die together, and that it must be a circumstance highly disgraceful for the Angles to meet the Britons on such unequal terms, as to fight against those persons for safety, whom they had been used voluntarily to attack for glory only; that, therefore, they should maintain their liberty with dauntless courage and the most strenuous exertions; but that of

¹ Edwin, with his son Osfrid, was slain at the battle of Hatfield Moor on the 12th October, A. D. 633. (Beda, E. H. § 146; Sax. Chron. A. D. 633; and Flor. of Worcester, A. D. 633.) The day of his celebration in the English Martyrology is the 4th of October.

³ See Beda, E. H. § 150.

⁴ See Saxon Chron. A. D. 634, and Beda, E. H. § 150. Osric was the son of Aelfric, brother of Alla, and cousin of Edwin.

⁷ Ceadwalla was slain at Dilston, near Hexham, in Northumberland. (Beda, E. H. § 151.) See also Smith's Appendix, No. xiii.

the impulse to flight no feeling whatever should be indulged. In consequence, they met with such fury on both sides that it may be truly said no day was ever more disastrous for the Britons, or more joyful for the Angles: so completely was one party routed with all its forces, as never to have hope of again recovering; so exceedingly powerful did the other become, through the effects of faith and the accompanying courage of the king. From this time, the worship of idols fell prostrate in the dust; and he governed the kingdom, extended beyond Edwin's boundaries, for eight years,¹ peaceably and without the loss of any of his people. History² sets forth the praises of this king in a high style of panegyric, of which I shall extract such portions as may be necessary, by way of conclusion. With what fervent faith his breast was inspired, may easily be learnt from the circumstance, that when at any time bishop Aidan³ addressed his auditors on the subject of their duty, in the Scottish tongue, and no interpreter was present, the king himself directly, though habited in the royal robe, glittering with gold or glowing with Tyrian purple, would graciously assume that office, and explain the foreign idiom in his native language. It is well known, too, that frequently at entertainments, when the guests had whetted their appetites and bent their inclinations on the feast, he would forego his own gratification, procuring by his abstinence comfort for the poor.⁴ So that I think the truth of that heavenly sentence was fulfilled even on earth, where the celestial oracle hath said, "He hath dispersed abroad, he hath given to the poor, his righteousness remaineth for ever."⁵ And moreover, what the hearer must wonder at and cannot deny, that identical royal right hand, the dispenser of so many alms, remains to this day perfect, with the arm, the skin, and nerves, though the remainder of the body, with the exception of the bones, mouldering into dust, has not escaped the common lot of mortality. It is true there are the corporeal remains of some saints unconscious altogether of decay. Wherefore let others determine by what standard they will fix their judgment; I pronounce this still more gracious and divine, on account of its singular manifestation, because matters however precious degenerate by frequency, and things are valued in proportion to their rarity. I should, indeed, be thought prolix, were I to relate how diligent he was to address his prayers on high, and to fill the heavens with supplications. This virtue of Oswald is too well known to require the support of our narrative. For at what time would that man neglect his supplications, who, in the insurrection excited by Penda, king of the Mercians,⁶ when his guards are put to flight, and himself actually carrying a forest of darts in his breast, could not be prevented, by the pain of his wounds or the approach of death, from praying to God for the souls of his faithful companions? In such manner this personage, of surpassing celebrity in this world, and highly in favour with God, ending a valuable life, transmitted his memory to posterity by a frequency of miracles; and that indeed deservedly. For it is not common, but even "more rare than a white crow,"¹ for men to abound in riches, and not to give indulgence to their vices. When he was slain, his arms with the hands and his head were cut off by the insatiable rage of his conqueror, and fixed on a stake. The trunk indeed, as I have mentioned, being laid to rest in the calm bosom of the earth, returned to its native dust; but the arms and hands, through the power of God, remain, according to the testimony of an author² of veracity, without corruption. These being placed by his brother Oswy in a shrine, at Bebbanburg³ (for so the Angles call the city), and shown for a miracle, bear testimony to the fact. Whether they remain in that place at the present day, I venture not rashly to affirm, because I waver in my opinion. If other historians have precipitately recorded any matter, let them be accountable: I hold common report at a cheaper rate, and affirm nothing but what is deserving of entire credit. The head was then buried by his before-mentioned brother⁴ at Lindisfarn; but it is said now to be preserved at Durham, in the arms of the blessed Cuthbert.⁵ When queen Osthrida,⁶ the wife of Ethelred king of the Mercians, and daughter of king Oswi, through regard to her uncle, was anxious to take the bones of the trunk to her monastery of Bardney, which is in the country of the Mercians, not far from the city of Lincoln, the monks refused her request for a short time at first; denying repose even to the bones of that man when dead, whom they had hated whilst living, because he had obtained their country by right of arms: but at midnight, being taught by a miraculous light from heaven shining on the reliques, to abate their haughty pride, they became converts to reason, and even intreated as a favour what before they had rejected. Miracles from on high became frequent in this place: every sick person who implored this most excellent martyr's assistance immediately received it. The withering turf grew greener from his blood; it restored a horse to health;⁷ and some of it being hung up against a post, the devouring flames fled from it in their turn. Some small portion of dust, moistened from his reliques, was equally efficacious in restoring a lunatic to his proper senses. The washings of the stake which had imbibed the blood fresh streaming from his head, restored health to one despairing of recovery. For a long time this monastery, possessing so great a treasure, flourished in the sanctity of its members and the abundance of its friends; more especially after king Ethelred received the crown of monastic tonsure there, where also his tomb is seen even to the present day. After many years, indeed, when the barbarians infested these parts, the bones of the most holy Oswald were removed to Gloucester. This place, at that period inhabited by canons,¹ contains but few inmates. Oswald, therefore, was the man who yielded the first-fruits of saintliness to his nation, since no Angle before him, to my knowledge, was celebrated for miracles : for after a life spent in sanctity, in liberally giving alms, in frequent watchings and prayer, and lastly, in waging war with a heathen through zeal for the church of God, he poured out his spirit, according to his wishes, before he could behold what was his greatest object of apprehension, the decline of Christianity. Nor indeed shall he be denied the praise of the martyrs, who first aspiring after a holy life, and next opposing his body to a glorious death, trod in their steps : in a manner he deserves higher commendation, since they consecrated themselves alone to God, but Oswald, not only himself, but all the Northumbrians with him.

Concerning Oswiu, the Brother of S. Oswald.

§ 50. On his removal from this world, Oswiu, his brother, assumed the dominion over the Bernicians, as did Oswin, the son of Osric, whom I have before mentioned,² over the Deiri ; and after meeting temperately at first on the subject of the division of the provinces, under a doubtful truce, they each retired peaceably to their territories. But not long after, by means of persons who delighted in sowing the seeds of discord, the peace, often mocked by ambiguous treaties, was finally broken, and vanished into air. Horrid crime ! that there should be men who could envy these kings their friendly intimacy, nor abstain from using their utmost efforts to precipitate them into battle. Here, then, fortune, who had before so frequently caressed Oswin with her blandishments, now wounded him with scorpion sting : for thinking it prudent to abstain from fighting, on account of the smallness of his force, he had secretly withdrawn to a country-seat, and being immediately betrayed by his own people, he was killed by Oswiu.³ He was a man admirably calculated to gain the favour of his subjects by his pecuniary liberality, and, as they relate, demonstrated his care for his soul by his fervent devotion. Oswiu, thus sovereign of the entire kingdom, did everything in his power whereby to wipe out this foul stain, and to increase his dignity ; extenuating the enormity of that atrocious deed by the rectitude of his conduct for the future. Indeed, the first and highest point of his glory is, that, nobly avenging his brother and his uncle, he slew Penda,⁴ king of the Mercians, that destroyer of his neighbours, that seed-plot of hostility, and from that period he either governed the Mercians, as well as almost all the Angles, himself, or was supreme over those who did so. Turning from this time altogether to offices of piety, that he might be truly grateful for the favours of God which were perpetually flowing down upon him, he proceeded to raise up and animate with all his power the infancy of the christian faith, fainting through his brother's death. This faith, brought shortly after to maturity by the learning of the Scots, but wavering in many ecclesiastical observances, he settled on canonical foundations; ¹ first by Angilbert ² and Wilfrid, and next by archbishop Theodore, for whose arrival in Britain ³ (although Egbert, king of Kent, as far as his province is concerned, takes much from his glory) the chief thanks are due to Oswiu. ⁴ Moreover, building numerous habitations for the servants of God, he left not his country destitute of this advantage also. The principal of these monasteries, at that time for females, but now for males, was situated about thirty miles north of York, and was anciently called Streneshalh, but now Witebi: it was begun by Hilda, ⁵ a woman of singular piety, and was augmented with large revenues by Ethelfleda, ⁶ daughter of this same king, who succeeded her in the government of it; in which place, also, she buried her father with all due solemnity, after he had reigned twenty-eight years. ⁷ This monastery, like all others of the same locality, being destroyed in the times of the Danish invasion (as will be related hereafter), was bereaved of the bodies of many saints; for the bones ⁸ of the blessed Aidan the bishop, of Cheolfred the abbot, and of that truly holy virgin Hilda, together with those of many others, were, as I have related in the book which I lately published on the "Antiquity of the Church of Glastonbury," at that time removed to Glastonbury, and those of other saints to different places. Now the monastery, under another name, and somewhat restored as circumstances permitted, hardly presents a vestige of its former opulence.

§ 51. To Oswiu, who had two sons ⁹ (the elder, who was illegitimate, being rejected), succeeded the younger, Egfrid, legitimately born; more valued on account of the good qualities of his most pious wife Etheldritha, than for his own. Yet he was certainly to be commended for two things which I have read in the history of the Angles; ¹⁰ his allowing his queen to dedicate herself to God, and his promoting the blessed Cuthbert to a bishopric, whose tears at the same time burst out with pious assent. But my mind shudders at the bare recollection of his outrage against the most blessed Wilfrid, ¹¹

⁹ Oswiu left a legitimate son, Egfrith, and an illegitimate one named Ealdfrith, who were successively kings of Bernicia.

¹¹ Wilfrith was ordained bishop of York, A. D. 665, and expelled from his bishopric in 677; he returned to England in 679, and was again expelled in 681. He was recalled to Northumberland in 687. In 692 he was again expelled, and retired to Aethilred, of Mercia, in which year he governed the vacant see of when, loathing his virtues, he deprived the country of this shining light. Overbearing towards the suppliant, a malady incident to all tyrants, he overwhelmed the Irish,¹ a race of men harmless in genuine simplicity and guiltless of every crime, with incredible slaughter. On the other hand, inactive towards the rebellious, and not following up the triumphs of his father, he lost the dominion over the Mercians; and moreover, being defeated in battle by Ethelred the son of Penda, their king, he lost his brother also.² Perhaps these last circumstances may be truly attributed to the unsteadiness of youth; but his conduct towards Wilfrid must be referred to the instigation of his wife³ and of the bishops, more especially as Beda, a man who knew not how to flatter, designates him, in his book of the Lives of his Abbots,⁴ as a man most pious and most beloved by God. At length, in the fifteenth year of his reign, leading an expedition against the Picts, and eagerly pursuing them, as they purposely retired to some secluded mountains, he perished with almost all his forces.⁵ The few who escaped by flight came home with the news. And yet the divine Cuthbert, from his knowledge of future events, had both attempted to keep him back when departing; and at the very moment of his death, enlightened by heavenly influence, declared, though at a distance, that he was slain.

§ 52. While a more than common report everywhere noised the death of Egfrid, "an intimation of it, borne on the wings of haste,"⁶ reached the ears of his brother Alfrid. Though the elder brother, he had been deemed by the nobility unworthy of the government from his illegitimacy, as I have observed,⁷ and had retired to Ireland, either through compulsion or indignation. In this place, safe from the persecution of his brother, he had from his ample leisure become deeply versed in literature, and had enriched his mind with every kind of learning; on which account the very persons who had formerly banished him, esteeming him the better qualified to manage the reins of government, now sent for him of their own accord, and fate rendered efficacious their intreaties. He did not disappoint their expectations; for during the space of nineteen years⁸ he presided over the kingdom in the utmost tranquillity and joy, doing nothing at which even greedy calumny itself could justly carp, except the persecution of that great man Wilfrid. However, he held not the same extent of territory as his father and brother, because the Picts (insolently profiting by their recent victory, and attacking the Angles, who had become more indolent through a lengthened peace) had curtailed his boundaries on the north.

Lichfield. He was expelled again in 703; and in the following year, his cause being decided in his favour at Rome, he returned to England. He died A. D. 709. His life has been written by Heddius, and is printed in Gale, vol. iii. It will form part of the present Collection. See also Beda, E. H. § 413.

§ 53. He had for his successor his son Osred,¹ a boy of eight years old, who, disgracing the throne for eleven years, and spending an ignominious life in the seducing of nuns, was ultimately taken off by the hostility of his relations. Yet he poured out to them a draught from the same cup; for Kenred,² after reigning two, and Osric eleven years,³ left only this to be recorded of them, that they expiated by a violent death the blood of their master, whom they supposed they had rightfully slain. Osric, indeed, deserved a happier end; for, as a heathen says, "he was more dignified than other shades,"⁴ because, while yet living, he had adopted Chelwulf,⁵ Kenred's brother, as his successor. Then Chelwulf ascended the giddy height of empire, the seventh in descent from Ida; a man competent in other respects, and withal possessed of a depth of literature, acquired by good abilities and indefatigable attention. Beda vouches for the truth of my assertion, who, at the very juncture when Britain most abounded with scholars, offered his *History of the Angles*⁶ for correction to this prince more especially; making choice of his authority, to confirm by his high station what had been well written, and of his learning, to rectify by his talents what might be carelessly expressed.

Concerning Beda.

§ 54. In the fourth year of his reign,⁷ that historian, after having written many books for the holy church, entered the heavenly kingdom, for which he had so long languished, in the year of our Lord's incarnation seven hundred and thirty-four,⁸ and in the fifty-ninth of his age:⁹ a man whom it is easier to admire than worthily to extol; who, though born in a remote corner of the world, was able to dazzle the whole earth with the brilliancy of his learning. For even Britain, which by some is called another world, since, surrounded by the ocean, it was not known by

² Coenred was the son of Cuthwin.

⁴ Virg. Æn. vi. 815.

⁶ See the Preface to the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, which that author addressed to king Ceolwulf.

⁸ See the last note.

⁹ Beda was born in the year 674, and died in 735; consequently he must have been in his sixty-first year. It would seem that Malmesbury is here misled by the statement made by Beda as to his age, at the period when he composed his Historia Ecclesiastica, he being then in the fifty-ninth year of his age; for he writes that "from the time of receiving the priesthood till the fifty-ninth year of my age, I have been employed for the benefit of myself and my friends in making these extracts," &c.

many geographers, possesses, in its remotest region,¹ bordering on Scotland, the place of his birth and education. This region, formerly redolent with the grateful odour of monasteries, or glittering with a multitude of cities built by the Romans, now desolate through the ancient devastations of the Danes, or the more recent of the Normans,² presents but little to allure the mind. Here is the river Wear, of considerable breadth and rapid tide, which, running into the sea, receives the vessels borne by gentle gales, on the calm bosom of its haven. Both its banks have been made conspicuous by one Benedict,³ who there built churches and monasteries;⁴ one dedicated to Peter and the other to Paul, united in the bond of brotherly love and of the same monastic rule. The industry and patience of this man every one must admire, who reads the book⁵ which Beda composed concerning his life and those of the succeeding abbots: his industry in bringing over a multitude of books, and being the first person who introduced in England constructors of stone edifices, or makers of glass windows, in which pursuits he spent almost his whole life abroad: the love of his country and his taste for elegance beguiling his painful labours, in the earnest desire of conveying something hitherto unknown to his countrymen; for very rarely before the time of Benedict, were buildings of stone⁶ seen in Britain, or did the solar ray cast its light into houses through the transparent glass. Again, his patience: for when in possession of the monastery of Saint Augustine at Canterbury, he cheerfully resigned it to Adrian when he arrived, not as one fearing the severity of the blessed Theodore the archbishop, but bowing to his authority. And farther, while long absent abroad, he endured not only with temper, but I may say with magnanimity, the substitution of another abbot, without his knowledge, by the monks of Wearmouth; and on his return, admitted him to equal honour with himself in rank and power. Moreover, when stricken so severely with the palsy that he could move none of his

² The devastations of the Danes commenced in 793, and were subsequently carried to a great extent during the reigns of Alfred and Ethelred. In the year 1069 the whole region was laid waste by the Conqueror.

³ Benedict, surnamed Biscop: he came to England with Archbishop Theodore, and was by him made abbot of the monastery of St. Augustine, Canterbury, which he soon resigned, and went back to Rome. He travelled to Rome five several times, occupying himself while there either in learning the Roman ritual, or in collecting books, pictures, and ornaments of various descriptions for the monasteries which he had founded at Wearmouth: he also brought over masons from France to build a church after the Roman manner, as well as glass-makers. He appears to have been a man of refined taste for the times in which he lived. On his return to England, he obtained a considerable quantity of land near the mouth of the Wear, where he built the two monasteries of which he was abbot. He died 12th January, 690.

⁴ The monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow.

limbs, he appointed a third abbot, because the other of whom we have spoken was not less afflicted with the same disease. And when the disorder, increasing, was just about to seize his vitals, he bade adieu to his companion, who was brought into his presence, with an inclination of the head only; nor was he better able to return the salutation, for he was hastening still more quickly to his end, and actually died before Benedict. Chelfrid succeeded, under whom the affairs of the monastery flourished beyond measure. When, through extreme old age, life ceased to be desirable to him, he purposed going to Rome, that he might pour out, as he hoped, his aged soul an offering to the apostles his masters; but failing of the object of his desires, he paid the debt of nature at the city of Langres. The relics of his bones were in after-time conveyed to his monastery, and, at the period of the Danish devastation, were taken with those of St. Hilda to Glastonbury.¹ The merits of these abbots, sufficiently eminent in themselves, their celebrated pupil Beda crowns with superior splendour. It is written, indeed, "A wise son is the glory of his father;"² for one of them made him a monk, the other educated him. And since Beda himself has given some slight notices of these facts, comprising his whole life in a kind of summary, it may be allowed to turn to his words, which the reader will recognise, lest any variation of the style should affect the relation. At the end, then, of the Ecclesiastical History of the Angles,³ this man, as praiseworthy in other respects as in this, that he withheld nothing from posterity, though it might be only a trifling knowledge of himself, says thus:—

§ 55. "I, Beda, the servant of Christ, and priest of the monastery of the holy apostles Peter and Paul which is at Wearmouth, have, by God's assistance, arranged these materials for the history of Britain. I was born within the possessions of this monastery, and at seven years of age was committed, by the care of my relations, to the most reverend abbot Benedict, to be educated, and afterwards to Chelfrid. Passing the remainder of my life from that period in residence at the said monastery, I have given up my whole attention to the study of the Scriptures, and, amid the observance of my regular discipline and my daily duty of singing in the church, have ever delighted to learn, to teach, or to write. In the nineteenth year of my life I received deacon's, in the thirtieth, priest's orders; both, at the instance of abbot Chelfrid, by the ministry of the most reverend bishop John;⁴ from which time of receiving the priesthood till the fifty-ninth year of my age, I have been employed, for the benefit of myself and of my friends,

¹ The monks of Glastonbury were apparently extremely diligent in procuring relics by every possible means. in making these extracts from the works of the venerable fathers, or in making additions, according to the form of their sense or interpretation."

§ 56. Then, enumerating thirty-six volumes which he published in seventy-eight books, he proceeds,—“ And I pray most earnestly, O merciful Jesus, that thou wouldest mercifully grant me, whom Thou hast kindly permitted to feed with benefit on the word of Thy wisdom, finally to come to Thee, the Fountain of all wisdom, and to appear for ever in Thy presence. Moreover,¹ I humbly entreat all persons, whether readers or hearers, whom this History of our Nation shall reach, that they be mindful to intercede with the Divine clemency for my infirmities both of mind and of body; and that, in their several provinces, they make me this grateful return, that I, who have diligently laboured to record, of every province or of more exalted places,² what appeared worthy of preservation or agreeable to the inhabitants, may receive from all the benefit of their pious intercessions.”

§ 57. Here my abilities fail, here my eloquence falls short; ignorant which to praise most, the number of his writings or the gravity of his style. No doubt he had imbibed a large portion of heavenly wisdom, to be able to compose so many volumes within the limits of so short a life. Nay, it is even reported that he went to Rome, for the purpose either of personally asserting that his writings were consistent with the doctrines of the church, or of correcting them by apostolical authority, should they be found repugnant thereto. That he was at Rome I do not, however, affirm for fact:³ but I have no doubt in declaring that he had been invited

² In allusion to his account of the holy places at Jerusalem and in its neighbourhood. Beda, E. II. §§ 404—407.

³ Beda's invitation to Rome has already been discussed in the Preface to the Ecclesiastical History of that writer, § 29. The following is Hardy's note upon Malmesbury's account of this incident in the life of Beda, which the reader will be glad to see entire:—“ From what is here stated, the tradition that Beda visited Rome met probably with supporters in Malmesbury's time, though he does not seem to attach great weight to it. The letter of pope Sergius, however, affords the strongest presumption that Beda was invited over; and the argument of the learned Wilkins assigns a probable reason why the journey was not undertaken; he thinks that the letter was written in the last year of the pontificate of Sergius, (A. D. 701,) and conjectures that the subsequent arrival of messengers in England with tidings of the pontiff's decease occasioned Beda to relinquish his purposed journey. An opinion, however, has been lately expressed, that ‘the story of Beda's summons to Rome is founded upon an error committed by Malmesbury, who, having met with a letter in which pope Sergius requested Ceolfriht, abbot of Jarrow, to send one of his monks to Rome, concluded that Beda was that individual, and most unjustifiably inserted his name therein.’ In support of this charge, it has been alleged that there is still extant (of an earlier date than Malmesbury's work) a copy of this letter (Tiberius, A. xv.) in which the passage relating to Beda does not occur. In answer to this it may be urged, that Ussher, who had seen and copied the letter from the MS. above alluded to, arrives at no such conclusion. He had, moreover, in his possession an ancient MS. containing the letter entire, from which Malmesbury gives but extracts; and therein Beda's name does occur, though he is not described as presbyter. The only inference drawn by Ussher is, that the omission of Beda's description is not without reason, inasmuch as he had not at that time been ordained priest. Before it can be admitted as a just inference that Malmesbury interpolated the passage in question, it must be shown thither, as the following epistle will certify; as well as that the see of Rome so highly esteemed him as greatly to desire his presence.

§ 58. "Sergius the bishop, servant of the servants of God, to Cheolfrid the holy abbot, sendeth greeting. With what words, and in what manner, can we declare the kindness and unspeakable providence of our God, and return fit thanks for his boundless benefits, who leads us, when placed in darkness and the shadow of death, to the light of knowledge?" And further on,—“Know that we received the favour of the offering which your devout piety hath sent by the present bearer, with the same joy and good-will with which it was transmitted. Assenting, therefore, to the timely and becoming prayers of your laudable anxiety with the deepest regard, we entreat of your pious goodness, so acceptable to God, that, since there have occurred certain points of ecclesiastical discipline, not to be promulgated without farther examination, which have made it necessary for us to confer with a person skilled in literature, as becomes an assistant of the holy universal mother-church devoted to God, you would not delay paying ready obedience to this our admonition; but would send, without any loss of time, to our lowly presence, at the church of the chief apostles my lords Peter and Paul, your friends and protectors, that religious servant of God, Beda, the venerable priest of your monastery,¹ whom, (God favouring your holy prayers,) the necessary discussion of the above-mentioned points being, by the assistance of God, solemnly completed, you may expect shortly to return prosperously to you: for whatever may be added to the church at large, by his assistance, will, we trust, be profitable to the things committed to your immediate care.”

§ 59. So extensive was his fame then, that even the majesty of Rome itself solicited his assistance in solving abstruse questions, nor did Gallic conceit ever find in this Angle anything justly to blame. All the Latin Church yielded the palm to his faith and authority: for indeed he was of sound and simple faith, and of pleasing eloquence; in all elucidations of the Holy Scriptures, discussing those points from which the reader might imbibe the that Tiberius, A. xv. was the identical copy of the letter he used; a conclusion which cannot be fairly drawn, as it is incredible but that other copies of the letter must have been extant when he wrote; and it ought rather to be contended that the one he saw must have contained the passage in dispute; for Malmesbury (whose great integrity is admitted by all writers) several times expressly declares that he declined inserting anything in his history for which he had not the best authority. Moreover, had he been guilty of the interpolation attributed to him, it is improbable that he would have used language so candid as that he has employed.”

love of God and of his neighbour, rather than those which might charm by their wit, or polish a rugged style. Moreover, the irrefragable truth of that sentence, which the majesty of Divine Wisdom¹ proclaimed to the world, forbids any one to doubt the sanctity of his life: "Wisdom will not enter the malevolent soul, nor dwell in the person of the sinful;" which indeed is said, not of earthly wisdom, which is infused promiscuously into the hearts of men, and in which even the wicked, who continue their crimes until their last day, seem often to excel, according to the divine expression,² "The sons of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light;" but it rather describes that wisdom which needs not the assistance of learning, and which dismisses from its cogitations those things which are void of understanding, that is to say, of the understanding of acting and speaking properly. Hence Seneca, in his book "De Causis,"³ appositely relates, that Cato, when defining the duty of an orator, said, "An orator is a good man, skilled in speaking." This ecclesiastical orator, then, used to purify his mind, that so he might be able to unveil the meaning of mystic writings. How, indeed, could that man be enslaved to vice, who gave his whole soul and spirit to elucidate the Scriptures? For, as he confesses in his third book on Samuel,⁴ if his expositions were productive of no advantage to his readers, yet they were of considerable importance to himself, inasmuch as, while fully intent upon them, he escaped the vanity and empty imaginations of the times. Purified from vice, therefore, he entered within the inner veil, divulging in pure diction the sentiments of his mind.

§ 60. But the unspotted sanctity and holy purity of his heart were chiefly conspicuous on the approach of death; for although for seven weeks successively, from the indisposition of his stomach, he nauseated all food, and was troubled with such a difficulty of breathing that his disorder confined him to his bed, yet he by no means abandoned his literary avocations. During whole days he endeavoured to mitigate the pressure of his disorder, and to lose the recollection of it, by constant readings with his pupils, and by examining and solving abstruse questions, in addition to his usual task of psalmody. Moreover, the Gospel of St. John, which from its difficulty exercises the talents of its readers even in the present day, was translated by him into the English language, and accommodated to those who did not perfectly understand Latin. Occasionally, also, would he admonish his disciples, saying, "Learn, my children, while I am with you: for I know not how long I shall continue; and, although my Maker should very shortly take me hence, and my spirit should return to Him that sent and granted it to come into this life, yet have I lived long. God hath rightly appointed my portion of days: I now desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ."

§ 61. Often, too, when the balance was poised between hope and fear, he would remark, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.¹ I have not passed my life among you in such manner as to be ashamed to live, neither do I fear to die, because we have a kind Master;" thus borrowing the expression of St. Ambrose when dying. Happy man! who could speak with so quiet a conscience, as neither being ashamed to live, nor yet afraid to die; on the one hand, not fearing the judgment of men; on the other, waiting with composure the hidden will of God. Oiten, when urged by extremity of pain, he comforted himself with these remarks: "The furnace tries the gold, and the fire of temptation the just man." "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared to the future glory which shall be revealed in us."² Tears, and a difficulty of breathing, accompanied his words. At night, when there were none to be instructed, or to note down his remarks, he passed the whole season in giving thanks and singing psalms; fulfilling the saying of that very wise man,³ "that he was never less alone than when alone." If at any time a short and disturbed sleep stole upon his eyelids, immediately chasing and repelling it, he showed that his affections were always intent on God, by exclaiming, "Lift me up, O Lord, that the proud calumniate me not. Do with thy servant according to thy mercy."⁴ These and similar expressions, which his shattered memory suggested, flowed spontaneously from his lips, whenever the pain of his agonizing disorder became mitigated. But on the Tuesday before our Lord's Ascension, his disease rapidly increasing, there appeared a small swelling in his feet, the sure and certain indication of approaching death. Then the congregation being called together, he was anointed and received the communion; and kissing them all, and requesting from each, that they would bear him in remembrance, he gave a small present, which he had privately reserved, to some with whom he had been in closer bonds of friendship. On Ascension-day, when his soul, tired of the frail occupation of the body, panted to be free, lying down on a hair-cloth near the oratory, where he had used to pray, with sense unimpaired and joyful countenance, he invited the grace of the Holy Spirit, saying, "O King of glory, Lord of virtue, who didst ascend this day triumphant into the heavens, leave us not destitute, but send upon us the Spirit of truth, which was promised by the Father." This prayer being ended, he breathed his last;⁵ and immediately the senses of all were pervaded by an odour, such as neither cinnamon nor balm could give, but coming as it were from paradise, and fraught with all the joyous exhalations of spring. At that time he was buried in the same monastery; but at present, report asserts⁶ that he lies at Durham with the blessed Cuthbert.

§ 62. With this man was buried almost all knowledge of history down to our times, inasmuch as there has been no Englishman either emulous of his pursuits, or a follower of his graces, who could continue the thread of his discourse, now broken short. Some few, indeed, "whom the mild Jesus loved,"¹ though well skilled in literature, have yet observed an ungracious silence throughout their whole lives; others, scarcely tasting of the stream, have fostered a criminal indolence. Thus, to slothful, others more slothful continually succeeding, the warmth of science for a long time decreased throughout the island. The verses of his epitaph will afford sufficient specimen of this indolence; disgraceful, indeed, and unworthy the tomb of so great a man:—²

"Presbyter hic Beda, requiescit carne sepultus;
Dona Christe animam in cœlis gaudere per ævum:
Daque illi sophiæ debriari fonte, cui jam
Suspiravit ovans, intento semper amore."

§ 63. Can this disgrace be extenuated by any excuse, that there was not to be found even in that monastery, where during his lifetime the school of all learning had flourished, a single person who could write his epitaph, except in this mean and miserable manner? But enough of this: now to my subject.

§ 64. Chelwulf, thinking it beneath the dignity of a Christian to be immersed in earthly things, abdicated the throne, after a reign of eight years, and assumed the monastic habit at Lindisfarne,³ in which place how meritoriously he lived, is amply testified by his distinguished interment⁴ near St. Cuthbert, and by many miracles vouchsafed from on high.

§ 65. He had made provision against the state being endangered, by placing his cousin, Egbert,⁵ on the throne, which he, running the race of a good man, filled for twenty years with singular moderation. Egbert had a brother of the same name, archbishop of York, who, by his own prudence and the power of the king, restored that see to its original state.⁶ For, as is well known to any one conversant in the history of the Angles,⁷ Paulinus,⁸ the first prelate deposited them in the cathedral church of Durham, in the early part of the eleventh century

"Here in the flesh rests Bede the priest; O give His soul with joy eternally to live;
And let him quaff, O Christ, of wisdom's stream:
This was his wish, his fond, perpetual theme."

⁴ Ceolwulf was buried at Lindisfarne, but the exact year of his death is not known.

⁵ Simeon of Durham and other authorities more correctly call this king Eadberht. According to Malmesbury, he had a brother of the same name, archbishop of York, Egberht, who was ordained bishop of that see A. D. 732, and died in 766.

⁸ Paulinus, after his flight from Northumbria, became bishop of Rochester. See § 26. He died 10th October, A. D. 644.

of the church of York, had been forcibly driven away, and dying at Rochester, had left there that honourable distinction of the pall which he had received from pope Honorius. After him many prelates of this august city, satisfied with the name of a simple bishopric, aspired to nothing higher: but when Egbert was enthroned, a man of loftier spirit, and one who thought that, as it is overreaching to require what is not our due, so is it ignoble to neglect our right, he recovered the pall by frequent appeals to the pope. This personage was, if I may be allowed the expression, the depository and receptacle of every liberal art, and built a most noble library at York: for this statement I cite Alcuin¹ as a competent witness; who, having sent him from the kings of England to the emperor Charles the Great, to treat of peace, and being hospitably entertained by him, observes in a letter to Eanbald,² third in succession from Egbert: "Praise³ and glory be to God, who hath preserved my days in full prosperity, that I should rejoice in the exaltation of my dearest son, who laboured in my stead in the church where I had been brought up and educated, and presided over the treasures of wisdom to which my beloved master, archbishop Egbert, had left me heir." Thus too to Charles Augustus:⁴ "Give me the more polished volumes of scholastic learning, such as I used to have in my own country, through the laudable and ardent industry of my master, archbishop Egbert.⁵ And, if it please your wisdom, I will send some of our youths, who may obtain thence whatever is necessary, and bring back into France the flowers of Britain, that the garden of paradise be not confined to York, but that some of its offshoots may be transplanted to Tours."

§ 66. This is the same Alcuin, who, as I have said,⁶ being sent into France to treat of peace, during his abode with Charles, either captivated with the pleasantness of the country or the kindness of the king, settled there; and being held in high estimation, he instructed the king's mind, during his leisure from the cares of state, with a thorough knowledge of logic, rhetoric, and even astronomy. Alcuin was, of all the Angles of whom I have read, next to the blessed Aldelm and Beda, certainly ¹ Flaccus Alcuinus, or, as he is sometimes called, Albinus, was a native of Northumbria. He went to France, and became the preceptor of Charlemagne, who made him abbot of St. Martin's at Tours, where he died. Such portions of his correspondence as illustrate the history of our nation will be given in a subsequent part of this Collection.

² This letter, written in the month of August, A. D. 796, must have been addressed to Eanbald II., as Eanbald I. died 29th July in that year. Eanbald II. was consecrated 14th August, 796, and received the pall in the following year.

⁴ Alc. Opp. i. 52, ep. xxxviii.

§ 67. But since I am arrived at that point where the mention of Charles the Great naturally presents itself, I shall subjoin a true statement of the descent of the kings of France, of which antiquity has said much; nor shall I depart widely from my design, because to be unacquainted with their race I hold as a defect in information, seeing that they are our near neighbours, and those to whom the Christian world chiefly looks up; and, perhaps, to glance over this compendium may give pleasure to many who have not leisure to wade through voluminous works.

On the Succession of Kings of France.

§ 68. The Franks were so called, by a Greek appellation, from the ferocity of their manners,² when, by order of the emperor Valentinian the First, they ejected the Alani, who had retreated to the Mæotian marshes. It is scarcely possible to believe how much this people, few and mean at first, became increased by a ten years' exemption from taxes; such, before the war, being the condition on which they engaged in it. Thus augmenting wonderfully by the acquisition of freedom, and first seizing the greatest part of Germany, and next the whole of Gaul, they compelled their inhabitants to list under their banners: hence the Lotharingi and Alamanni, and other nations beyond the Rhine, who are subject to the emperor of Germany, affirm that they ought more properly to be called Franks; and those whom we suppose to be Franks, they call by an ancient appellation Galwæ, that is to say, Gauls. To this opinion I assent; knowing that Charles the Great, whom none can deny to have been king of the Franks, always used the same vernacular language with the Franks on the other side of the Rhine. Any one who shall read the life of Charles will readily admit the truth of my assertion.³ In the year, then, of the Incarnate Word four hundred and twenty-five,⁴ the Franks were governed by Faramund their first king.⁵ The grandson of Faramund was

² The sophist Libanius, a writer of the fourth century, states that in his time there was on the Rhine, near the ocean, a nation of Celts so warlike and valiant that they acquired the name of φραγκοί, a name that has been corrupted into φραγκοί (Franci).

³ The life of Charlemagne, written by Eginhardt, who was secretary to that monarch. Script. Franc. Duchesne, tom. ii.

Meroveus,¹ from whom all the succeeding kings were called Merovingians.² In like manner the sons of the kings of the Angles took patronymical appellations from their fathers. For instance, the son of Edgar was called Eadgaring; the son of Edmund, Edmunding; and the rest in like manner; commonly, however, they are called Ethelings.³ The native language of the Franks therefore partakes of that of the Angles, by reason of both nations originating from Germany. The Merovingians reigned successfully and powerfully till the year of our Lord's incarnation six hundred and eighty-seven.⁴ At that period, Pipin,⁵ son of Ansegise, was made mayor of the palace among the Franks on the other side of the Rhine. Seizing opportunities for veiling his ambitious views, he completely subjugated his master Theodoric, the dregs as it were of the Merovingians; and to lessen the obloquy excited by the transaction, he indulged him with the empty title of king, while himself managed everything, at home and abroad, according to his own pleasure. The genealogy of this Pipin,⁶ both to and from him, is thus traced: Ansbert the senator, by Blithilde the daughter of Lothaire, the father of Dagobert, begot Arnold: Arnold begot St. Arnulf, bishop of Metz:⁷ Arnulf begot Flodulf,⁸ Waltchise, Anchise: Flodulf begot duke Martin,⁹ whom Ebroin¹⁰ slew: Waltchise begot

¹ He is supposed to have been the son of Clodion, whom he succeeded in the year 447. He died A. D. 456.

³ This epithet seems merely to imply nobility.

⁹ Martin, duke of Austrasia, son of St. Clou, bishop of Metz, was slain by Ebroin, A. D. 680.

¹⁰ He was mayor of the palace, and was slain by Ermenfroi A. D. 681.

the most holy Wandregesil the abbot: duke Anschise¹ begot Ansegise: Ansegise begot Pipin: the son of Pipin was Carolus Tudites,² whom they also call Martel, because he beat down the tyrants who were rising up in every part of France, and nobly defeated the Saracens, at that time infesting Gaul. Following the practice of his father, himself satisfied with the title of earl, he kept the kings in a state of pupilage: he left two sons, Pipin and Carloman.³ Carloman, from some unknown cause, relinquishing the world, took the tonsure at Monte Cassino.⁴ Pipin was crowned⁵ king of the Franks, and patrician of the Romans, in the church of St. Denis, by pope Stephen, the successor of Zachary. For the Constantinopolitan emperors, already much degenerated from their ancient valour, giving no assistance either to Italy or the church of Rome, which had long groaned under the tyranny of the Lombards, this pope bewailed the injuries to which they were exposed from them to the ruler of the Franks; wherefore Pipin, passing the Alps, reduced Desiderius,⁶ king of the Lombards, to such difficulties, that he restored what he had plundered to the church of Rome, and took an oath that he would not attempt to resume it. Returning to France after some years, he died,⁷ leaving Charles and Carloman surviving him. In two years Carloman departed this life.⁸ Charles,⁹ obtaining the name of "Great" from his exploits, enlarged the kingdom to twice the limits which it had possessed in his father's time: and being contented for more than thirty years with the simple title of king, abstained from the appellation of emperor, though repeatedly invited to assume it by pope Adrian. But when, after the death of this pontiff, his relations maimed the holy Leo, his successor, in the church of St. Peter, by cutting out

² The epithet of Martel, which Tudites seems also to imply, was given to him as expressive of his weighty and irresistible strokes in battle.

³ Carloman, the eldest son of Charles Martel, succeeded him in Austrasia; and Pepin, his younger son, in Neustria, Bourgogne, and Provence.

⁶ It was Aistolphe, king of the Lombards, and not Desiderius, whom Pepin obliged to restore the towns he had usurped from the Holy See. Upon the death of Aistolphe in the year 756, Desiderius, or Didier, duke of Tuscany, was proclaimed king; he was the last of the native princes of Lombardy, having surrendered his sceptre and his capital to Charlemagne, by whom he was defeated in the year 774.

his tongue, and putting out his eyes,¹ Charles hastily proceeded to Rome to settle the state of the church. Justly punishing these abandoned wretches, he stayed there the whole winter, and restored the pontiff, now speaking plainly and seeing clearly by the miraculous interposition of God, to his customary power. At this time the Roman people, with the privity of the pontiff, on the day of our Lord's Nativity,² unexpectedly saluted him with the title of Augustus; which title, though, from its being unusual, he reluctantly accepted, yet afterwards he defended it with proper spirit against the Constantinopolitan emperors, and left it, as hereditary, to his son Lewis.³ His descendants reigned in that country, which is now properly called France, till the time of Hugh, surnamed Capet,⁴ from whom is descended the present Lewis.⁵ From the same stock came the sovereigns of Germany and Italy, till the year of our Lord nine hundred and twelve. Then Conrad,⁶ king of the Teutons, seized that empire. The grandson of this personage was Otho the Great,⁷ equal in every estimable quality to any of the emperors who preceded him. Thus admirable for his valour and goodness, he left the empire in hereditary succession to his posterity:⁸ for the present Henry⁹ derives his lineage from his blood.

§ 69. To return to my narrative: Alcwin, though promoted by Charles the Great to the monastery of St. Martin in France, was not unmindful of his fellow-countrymen; but exerted himself to retain the emperor in amity with them, and stimulated them to virtue by frequent epistles. I shall here subjoin many of his observations, from which it will appear clearly, how extremely soon

² Charlemagne was crowned emperor of the West by pope Leo III. on Christmas-day, in the last year of the eighth century.

⁸ Upon the extinction of the line of Charlemagne, the empire of the West became elective.

after the death of Beda the love of learning declined even in his own monastery, and how quickly after the decease of Egbert the kingdom of the Northumbrians came to ruin, through the prevalence of degenerate manners.

§ 70. He says thus to the monks of Wearmouth,¹ among whom Beda had both lived and died, obliquely accusing them of having done the very thing which he begs them not to do:² "Let the youths be accustomed to attend the praises of our heavenly King, not to dig up the burrows of foxes, or pursue the winding mazes of hares: let them now learn the holy Scriptures, that when they are grown up they may be able to instruct others. Remember the most noble teacher of our times, Beda the priest; what thirst for learning he had in his youth, what praise he now has among men, and what a far greater reward of glory with God!" Again, to those of York he says: "The Searcher of my heart is witness, that it was not for lust of gold that I came to France, or continued there, but for the necessities of the church."³ And thus he writes to Offa, king of the Mercians:⁴ "I was prepared to come to you, with the presents of king Charles, and to return to my country: but it seemed more advisable to me, for the peace of my nation, to remain abroad, not knowing what I could have done among those persons, with whom no one can be secure, or able to proceed in any laudable pursuit. Lo! the holy places are laid desolate by Pagans,⁵ the altars polluted by perjury, the monasteries dishonoured by adultery, the earth itself stained with the blood of rulers and of princes." Again, to king Egelred, third in the sovereignty after Egbert: "Behold⁶ the church of St. Cuthbert sprinkled with the blood of God's priests, despoiled of all its ornaments, and the holiest spot in Britain given up to pagan nations to be plundered; and where, after the departure of St. Paulinus from York, the christian religion first took its rise in our own nation, there misery and calamity took their rise also. What portends that shower of blood, which in the time of Lent, in the city of York, the capital of the whole kingdom, in the church of the chief of the apostles,⁷ we saw tremendously falling on the northern side of the building from the summit of the roof, though the weather was fair? Must not blood be expected to come upon the land from the northern regions?" Again, to Osbert,⁷ prince of the Mercians: "Our kingdom of the Northumbrians has almost perished through internal dissensions and perjury." So also to Adalard, archbishop of Canterbury:⁸ "I speak this on account of the scourge⁹ which has lately fallen on that part of our island which has been inhabited by our forefathers for nearly three hundred and forty years. It is recorded in the writings of Gildas,¹ the wisest of the Britons, that those very Britons ruined their country through the avarice and rapine of their princes, the iniquity and injustice of their judges, the bishops' neglect of preaching, the luxury and abandoned manners of the people. Let us be cautious that such vices become not prevalent in our times, in order that the Divine favour may preserve our country to us, in that happy prosperity for the future which hitherto, in his most merciful kindness, He has vouchsafed to us."

§ 71. It has been made evident, I think, what disgrace and what destruction the neglect of learning and the immoral manners of degenerate men brought upon England! These remarks obtain this place in my History merely for the purpose of cautioning my readers.

§ 72. Egbert,² then, rivalling his brother in piety, and receiving the tonsure, gave place to Osulph³ his son, who being, without any offence on his part, slain by his subjects, was after a twelve-month's reign succeeded by Mollo:⁴ and he carrying on the government with commendable diligence for eleven years,⁵ fell a victim to the treachery of Alcred. Alcred,⁶ in his tenth year, was compelled by his countrymen to retire from the government which he had usurped. Ethelbert⁷ too, the son of Mollo, being elected king by their consent, was expelled by them at the end of five years. Alfwold,⁸ next hailed sovereign, lamented, after eleven years, the perfidy of the inhabitants; being assassinated, though guiltless, which his distinguished interment at Hexham and divine miracles sufficiently declare. His nephew, Osred,⁹ the son of Alcred, succeeding him, was expelled after barely a year, and gave place to Ethelbert, who was also called Athelred. He was the son of Mollo, also called Athelwald; and, obtaining the kingdom after twelve years of exile, held it during four, at the end of which time, unable to escape the fate of his predecessors, he was cruelly murdered.¹⁰ At this many of the bishops and nobles, greatly shocked, fled from the country. Some, indeed, affirm that he was punished deservedly, because he had assented to the unjust murder of Osred;¹¹ whereas he had it in his power to quit the sovereignty, and restore him to

³ Osulf was murdered on the 24th of July, 759.

⁴ Mull Athelwald, the paternal uncle of Osulf, was elected king on the 5th August, 759.

⁶ Alhhred was driven from the throne A. D. 774.

⁷ Athelberht, or Athelred, the son of Mull Athelwald, was banished by Alfwold in 779.

⁸ Alfwald was slain on the 23d September, A. D. 789.

⁹ Osred was expelled from his kingdom A. D. 790, and Athelberht was restored after an exile of twelve years.

his throne. Of the beginning of this reign Alcwin thus speaks: "Blessed be God, the only worker of miracles: Ethelred, the son of Adelwald, went lately from the dungeon to the throne, from misery to grandeur; by the recentness of whose accession we are detained from coming to you."¹ Of his murder he writes thus to Offa, king of the Mercians:² "Your esteemed kindness is to understand that my lord, king Charles, often speaks to me of you with affection and sincerity, and in him you have the firmest friend: he therefore sends becoming presents to your grace, and to the several episcopal sees of your kingdom. In like manner he had appointed presents for king Ethelred, and for the sees of his bishops; but oh, dreadful to think! at the very moment of despatching these gifts and letters, there came a sorrowful account by the ambassadors, who returned out of Scotland through your country, of the faithlessness of the people, and the death of the king. So that Charles, withholding his liberal gifts, is so highly incensed against that nation, calling it perfidious and perverse, and the murderer of its sovereigns, and esteeming it worse than pagan, that had I not interceded, he would have already deprived them of every advantage within his reach, and have done them all the injury in his power."

§ 73. After Ethelred no one durst ascend the throne;³ each dreading the fate of his predecessor, and preferring a life of safety in inglorious ease to a tottering reign in anxious suspense; for most of the Northumbrian kings had made their exit by a violent death, which was now become almost habitual. Thus being without a sovereign for thirty-three years, that province became an object of plunder and contempt to its neighbours; for when the Danes, who (as I have before related from the words of Alcwin) laid waste the holy places, on their return home represented to their countrymen the fruitfulness of the island and the indolence of its inhabitants, these barbarians, coming over hastily and in great numbers, obtained forcible possession of that part of the country till the time of which we are speaking. Indeed, they had a king of their own for many years, though he was subordinate to the authority of the king of the West Saxons: however, after the lapse of these thirty-three years, king Egbert⁴ obtained the sovereignty of this province, as well as of the others, in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and twenty-seven, and the twenty-eighth of his reign. And since we have reached his times, mindful of our engagement, we shall speak briefly of the kingdom of the Mercians; and this, as well because we admire brevity in relation, as that there is no great abundance of materials.

² Alc. Opp. i. 57, epist. xlii.

Of the Kingdom of the Mercians.

§ 74. In the year of our Lord's incarnation six hundred and twenty-six, and the hundred and thirty-ninth after the death of Hengist, Penda,¹ the son of Wibba, tenth in descent from Woden, of noble lineage, expert in war, but at the same time an irreligious heathen, assumed the title of king of the Mercians, when, now arrived at the age of fifty, he had fostered his presumption by frequent incursions on his neighbours. Seizing the sovereignty, therefore, with a mind loathing quiet, and unconscious how great an enormity it was even to be victorious in a contest against his own countrymen, he began to attack the neighbouring cities, to infest the confines of the surrounding kings, and to fill everything with terror and confusion. For what would not that man attempt, who, by his lawless daring, had extinguished those luminaries of Britain, Edwin² and Oswald,³ kings of the Northumbrians, Sigebert,⁴ Egric,⁵ and Anna,⁶ kings of the East Angles, men in whom nobility of race was equalled by sanctity of life? Chenwalch also, king of the West Saxons, after being frequently harassed by him, was driven into exile;⁷ though he deservedly paid the penalty of his perfidy towards God in denying his faith, and towards Penda himself in repudiating his sister.⁸ It is now irksome to relate, that eagerly watching opportunities of slaughter, and like a raven greedily flying at the scent of a carcass, he readily joined in assisting Chedwalla,⁹ and was of infinite service to him in recovering his dominion. In this manner, for thirty years, attacking his countrymen, he did nothing worthy of record against strangers. His insatiable desires, however, at last found an end suitable to their deserts: for being routed with his allies by Oswiu, who had succeeded his brother Oswald, more through the assistance of God than his military powers, Penda¹⁰ added to the number of infernal spirits. By his queen Kineswitha¹¹ his sons were Weda, Wulfer, Ethelred, Merewald, Mercelin: his daughters, Kineburga and Kineswitha, both distinguished for inviolable chastity. Thus the parent, though ever rebellious towards God, produced a most holy offspring for heaven.

§ 75. His son Weda¹² succeeded him in a portion of the kingdom, by the permission of Oswiu, advanced to the government of the ¹ Great obscurity prevails about the early history of Mercia. Henry of Huntingdon considers Crida to have been the founder of that kingdom, about the year 584. Crida died in the year 600, and was succeeded by Wibba, who died A.D. 610. Ceorl was the next in succession, and Penda succeeded him. Malmesbury here follows the Saxon Chronicle in dating Penda's reign from A.D. 626; but Beda says that he reigned for twenty-two years, and died in 655. His reign began, therefore, in 633, the year of his victory over Edwin. See the Eccles. Hist. § 148.

¹¹ See Beda, E. H. § 221.

South Mercians; a young man of talents, and even in his father's lifetime son-in-law¹ to Oswiu. For he had received his daughter on condition of renouncing his idols and embracing Christianity, in which faith he would soon have caused the province to participate, the peaceful state of the kingdom and his father-in-law's consent conspiring to such a purpose, had not his death, hastened as they say by the intrigues of his wife, intercepted these happy prospects. Then Oswiu resumed the government,² which seemed rightly to appertain to him from his victory over the father, and from his affinity to the son. The spirit, however, of the inhabitants could not brook his authority more than three years;³ for, expelling his generals, and Wulfer,⁴ the son of Penda, being hailed as successor, the province recovered its liberty.

§ 76. Wulfer, that he might not deceive the expectation of the people, began to act with energy, to show himself an efficient prince by great exertions both mental and bodily; and finally he gave to Christianity, which had been introduced by his brother, and yet hardly breathing in his kingdom, every possible assistance. In the early years of his reign, he was heavily oppressed by the king of the West Saxons; but in succeeding times,⁵ repelling the injury by the energy of his measures, he deprived him of the sovereignty of the Isle of Wight; and turning it, yet panting after heathen rites, into the proper path, he soon after bestowed it on Ethelwalk, king of the South Saxons, for whom he had stood as sponsor in baptism, as a recompense for his faith. But these and all his other good qualities are stained and deteriorated by the dreadful brand of simony; because he, first of the kings of the Angles, sold the sacred bishopric of London to one Wina,⁶ an ambitious man. His wife was Ermenhilda, the daughter of Ercombent, king of Kent, on whom he begat Kenred and Waraburga, a most holy virgin, who lies buried at Chester. His brother Merewald married Ermenburga, the daughter of Ermenred, brother of the same Ercombent; by her he had issue three daughters, Milburga, who lies at Weneloc; Mildritha in Kent, in the monastery of St. Augustine, and Mildritha,⁷ and a son Merefyn. Alfrid, king of the Northumbrians, married Kineburga, daughter of Penda, who after a time, disgusted with wedlock, took the habit of a nun in the monastery which her brothers Wulfer and Aethelred had founded.

² After Penda was vanquished by Oswiu, the kingdom of Mercia fell into his hands, a portion of which he bestowed upon Peada, after whose death it reverted to Oswiu. ³ See Beda, E. H. § 224.

⁴ Upon the expulsion of Oswiu from Mercia, Wulfher succeeded to that kingdom, A. D. 657.

⁷ Such is the reading of the Latin text; but we should substitute "Mildgytha." See the Genealogy in Florence of Worcester, pp. 387, 396.

§ 77. Wulfer dying at the end of nineteen years,¹ his brother Ethelred² ascended the throne, more famed for his pious disposition than his skill in war. Moreover, satisfied, in a single but illustrious expedition into Kent,³ with the display of his valour, he passed the remainder of his life in quiet; except that, attacking Egfrid, king of the Northumbrians,⁴ who had passed beyond the limits of his kingdom, he induced him to return home by killing his brother Elwin. He atoned, however, for this slaughter, after due deliberation, at the instance of the blessed Theodore the archbishop, by giving Egfrid a large sum of money.⁵ Subsequently to this, in the thirtieth year of his reign, taking the cowl, he became a monk at Bardney,⁶ and was ultimately promoted to be abbot. This is the same person, who, being contemporary with Ina, king of the West Saxons, confirmed by his authority also the privilege which St. Aldelm, as we have before mentioned, brought from Rome.⁷ His wife was Ostgida, sister of Egfrid, king of the Northumbrians, by whom she had issue a son, named Ceolred.

§ 78. He appointed Kenred,⁸ the son of his brother Wulfer, to be his successor, who, equally celebrated for piety to God and uprightness towards his subjects, ran his mortal race with great purity of manners; and proceeding to Rome in the fifth year of his reign,⁹ passed the remainder of his life there in the offices of religion; chiefly instigated to this by the melancholy departure of a soldier, who, as Beda relates,¹⁰ disdaining to confess his crimes when in health, saw manifestly, when at the point of death, those very demons coming to punish him, to whose vicious allurements he had surrendered his soul.

§ 79. After him reigned Chelred,¹¹ the son of Ethelred his uncle, as conspicuous for his valour against Ina, as pitiable for an early death; for not filling the throne more than eight¹² years, he was buried at Lichfield, leaving Ethelbald, the grand-nephew of Penda by his brother Alwi,¹³ as his heir. This king enjoying the sovereignty in profound peace, and for a long time, that is, for the space of forty-one years, was ultimately killed by his subjects,¹ and thus met with a reverse of fortune. Bernred,² the author of his death, left nothing worthy of record, except that afterwards, being himself put to death by Offa, he received the just reward of his treachery. To this Ethelbald, Boniface,³ archbishop of Mentz, an Englishman, who was subsequently crowned with martyrdom, sent an epistle,⁴ part of which I shall transcribe, that it may appear how freely he asserts that those very vices had already gained ground among the Angles, of which Alcwin in after times was apprehensive. It will also be a strong proof, by the remarkable deaths of certain kings, how severely God punishes those guilty persons for whom his long-suspended anger mercifully waits.

⁵ That is, he paid the weregild, which was a pecuniary mulct for killing a man; one moiety of which went to the public purse, and the other to the relations of the deceased. The were of every man, from the prince to the slave, was established by law. The legal compensation paid to king Ini by the Kentish men for the death of Mull was, according to the Saxon Chronicle, no less a sum than thirty thousand pounds. A king's weregild was fixed at thirty thousand thrysmas, according to the laws of the North people.—See Anglo-Saxon Laws by Thorpe, i. 186, ed. 8vo. See note, § 35.

§ 80. "To Ethelbald, my dearest lord, and to be preferred to all other kings of the Angles in the love of Christ, Boniface the archbishop, the legate appointed for Germany by the church of Rome, wisheth perpetual health in Christ.

"We confess before God that when we hear of your prosperity, your faith, and good works, we rejoice; and if at any time we hear of any adversity befalling you, either in the chance of war or the jeopardy of your soul, we are afflicted. We have heard that being devoted to almsgiving, you prohibit theft and rapine, that you are a lover of peace, a defender of widows and of the poor; and for this we give God thanks. Your contempt for lawful matrimony, were it for chastity's sake, would be laudable; but that you wallow in luxury, and in adultery even with nuns,—this is disgraceful and damnable; it dims the brightness of your glory before God and man, and transforms you into an idolater because you have polluted the temple of God. Wherefore, my beloved son, repent, and remember how dishonourable it is that you, who by the grant of God are sovereign over many nations, should yourself be the slave of lust to his disservice. Moreover, we have heard that almost all the nobles of the nation of the Mercians, following your example, desert their lawful wives, and live in guilty intercourse with adulteresses and nuns. Let the custom of a foreign country teach you how far distant this is from rectitude: for in Old Saxony, where there is no knowledge of Christ, if a virgin in her father's house, or a married woman under the protection of her husband, should be guilty of adultery, they burn her, strangled by her own hand, and hang up her seducer over the grave where she is buried; or else cutting off her garments to the waist, modest matrons whip her and pierce her with knives, and fresh tormentors punish her in the same manner, as she is driven from town to town, till they destroy her. Again the Winedi, the most depraved race of men, have this custom: the wife, on the death of her husband, casts

² Beornred was dethroned and slain by Offa A. D. 757.

herself on the same funeral pile to be consumed with him. If then the Gentiles, who know not God, have so zealous a regard for chastity, how much more does it befit you, my beloved son, who are both a Christian and a king? Spare therefore your own soul, spare a multitude of people, perishing by your example, for whose souls you must give account. Give heed to this too; if the nation of the Angles, (and we are reproached in France and in Italy, and by the very Pagans for it,) despising lawful matrimony, give free indulgence to adultery, a race ignoble, and despising God, must necessarily proceed from such a mixture, which will destroy the country by their abandoned manners, as was the case with the Burgundians, Provençals, and Spaniards, whom the Saracens harassed for many years on account of their past transgressions.

“ Moreover, it has been told us that you have taken away from the churches and monasteries many of their privileges, thereby exciting, by your example, your nobility to do the like. But recollect, I entreat you, what terrible vengeance God hath inflicted upon former kings who have been guilty of the crime which we lay to your charge. For Chelred, your predecessor, the debaucher of nuns, the infringer of ecclesiastical privileges, was seized, while splendidly regaling with his nobles, by a malignant spirit, who snatched away his soul without confession and without communion, while he was talking with the devil and despising the law of God. He drove Osred also, king of the Deiri and Bernicians, who was guilty of the same crimes, to such excess, that he lost his kingdom, and perished in early manhood by an ignominious death. Charles also, governor of the Franks, the subverter of many monasteries, and the appropriator of ecclesiastical revenues to his own use, perished by excruciating pain and a fearful death.

§ 81. “ Wherefore, my beloved son, we entreat with paternal and fervent prayers, that you would not despise the counsel of your fathers, who, for the love of God, anxiously appeal to your highness. For nothing is more salutary to a good king than the willing correction of such crimes when they are pointed out to him, since Solomon says, ‘ Whoso loveth instruction, loveth wisdom.’ [Prov. xii. 1.] Wherefore, my dearest son, showing you good counsel, we call you to witness, and entreat you by the living God, and his Son Jesus Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, that you would recollect how fleeting and how short is the present life, how momentary is the delight of the filthy flesh, and how ignominious it is for a person of transitory existence to leave a bad example to posterity. Begin, therefore, to regulate your life by better habits, and correct the past errors of your youth, that you may have praise before men here, and be blest with eternal glory hereafter. We wish your highness health and growth in virtue.”

§ 82. I have inserted in my narrative portions of this epistle, to give sufficient knowledge of these circumstances, partly in the words of the author, and partly in my own, shortening the sentences as seemed proper; for which I shall easily be excused, because there was need of brevity for the sake of those who were eager to resume the thread of the history. Moreover, Boniface transmitted an epistle of like import to archbishop Cuthbert, adding that he should remonstrate with the clergy and nuns on the fineness and vanity of their dress. Besides, that he might not wonder at his interfering in that matter in which he had no apparent concern—that is to say, how or with what manners the nation of the Angles conducted itself—he gave him to understand that he had bound himself by oath to pope Gregory the third, not to conceal the conduct of the nations near him from the knowledge of the apostolical see; wherefore, if mild measures failed of success, he should take care to act in such manner, that vices of this kind should not be kept secret from the pope. Indeed, on account of the fine texture of the clerical vestments, Alcwin¹ obliquely glances at Adelard the archbishop, Cuthbert's successor, reminding him that when he should come to Rome to visit the emperor Charles the Great, the grandson of Charles of whom Boniface was speaking above, he should not bring the clergy or monks, dressed in party-coloured or gaudy garments, because the French clergy used only ecclesiastical habits.

§ 83. Nor could the letters of so great a man, which he was accustomed to send from watchful regard to his legation and love of his country, be without effect; for both Cuthbert the archbishop, and king Ethelbald, summoned a council for the purpose of retrenching the superfluities which he had stigmatised. The acts of this synod,² veiled in a multiplicity of words, I shall forbear to add, as I think they will better accord with another part of my work,³ when I come to the succession of the bishops; but as I am now on the subject of kingly affairs, I shall subjoin a charter of Ethelbald as a proof of his devotion, because it took place in the same council:—

§ 84. “It often happens, through the uncertain change of times, that those things which have been confirmed by the testimony and advice of many faithful persons, have been made of none effect by the contumacy of others, or by the artifices of deceit, without any regard to justice, unless they have been committed to eternal memory by the authority of writing and the testimony of charters. Wherefore, I Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, out of love to heaven and regard for my own soul, have felt the necessity of considering how I may, by good works, set it free from every tie of sin: for since the omnipotent God, through the greatness of his clemency, without any previous merit on my part, hath bestowed on me the sceptre of government, therefore I willingly repay Him out of that which He hath given. On this account I grant, so long as I live, that all monasteries and churches of my kingdom shall be exempted from public taxes, works, and impositions, except the building of forts and bridges, from which none can be released. And, moreover, the servants of God shall have perfect liberty in the produce of their woods and lands, and the right of fishing, nor shall they bring presents either to king or princes except voluntarily, but they shall serve God without molestation," &c.

§ 85. Lullus¹ succeeded Boniface, an Englishman by birth also, of whose sanctity mention is made in the life of St. Goar;² and these verses bear witness, which I remember to have heard from my earliest childhood :

“Lullus, than whom no holier prelate lives,
By God’s assistance healing medicine gives,
Cures each disorder by his powerful hand,
And with his glory overspreads the laud.”

§ 86. However, to return to my history: Offa,³ descended from Penda in the fifth degree, succeeded Ethelbald; he was a man of a great mind, and one who would endeavour to effect whatever he had preconceived: he reigned thirty-nine years. When I consider the deeds of this person, I am doubtful whether I should commend or censure. At one time, in one and the same individual, vices were so palliated by virtues, and at another, virtues came in such quick succession upon vices, that it is difficult to determine “how to characterise the changing Proteus:”⁴ my narrative shall give examples of each. Engaging in a pitched battle with Kinewulf, king of the West Saxons,⁵ he easily gained the victory, though the other was a celebrated warrior. When he thought artifice would better suit his purpose, this same man beheaded king Ethelbert,⁶ who had come to him through the allurements of great promises, and was at that very time within the walls of his palace, deluded into security by his perfidious attentions; and then unjustly seized upon the kingdom of the East Angles which Ethelbert had held.

§ 87. The reliques of St. Alban,⁷ at that time obscurely buried, he ordered to be reverently taken up and placed in a shrine, decorated to the fullest extent of royal munificence with gold and jewels; a church of most beautiful workmanship was there erected, and a society of monks assembled. Yet, rebellious against God, he endeavoured to remove the archiepiscopal see, formerly settled at Canterbury, to Lichfield;⁸ envying, forsooth, the men of Kent the dignity of the archbishopric; on which account he at last deprived Lanbriht the archbishop, worn out with continual exertion, (and who produced many edicts of the apostolical see, both ancient and modern,) of all the possessions within his territories, as well as of the jurisdiction over the bishoprics. From pope Adrian, therefore, whom he had wearied with plausible assertions for a long time, (for many things which ought not to be granted may be gradually drawn and artfully wrested from minds intent on other occupations,) he obtained, that there should be an archbishopric of the Mercians at Lichfield, and that all the prelates of the Mercians should be subject to that province. Their names were as follow:—Denebert, bishop of Worcester, Werenbert of Leicester, Edulf of Sidnacester, Wulheard of Hereford: and the bishops of the East Angles, Alheard of Helmham, Tidfrid of Dunwich: the bishop of Lichfield was named Aldulf. Four bishops, however, remained suffragan to the archbishop of Canterbury: London, Winchester, Rochester, and Selsey. Some of these bishoprics are now in being; some are removed to other places; others consolidated by venal interest: for Leicester, Sidnacester, and Dunwich, from some unknown event, are no longer in existence. Nor did Offa's rapacity stop here: but this downright public pilferer converted to his own use the lands of many churches, of which Malmesbury was one. But this iniquity did not long deform canonical institutions; for soon after, Kenulf, Offa's successor, inferior to no preceding king in power or in faith, transmitting a letter to Leo, the successor of Adrian, restored Aethelard, who had succeeded Lanbriht, to his former dignity. Hence Albinus, in an epistle to the same Aethelard, says: ¹ "Having heard of the success of your journey, and your return to your country, and how you were received by the pope, I give thanks with all my heart to the Lord our God, who, by the precious gift of his mercy, directed your way with a prosperous progress; gave you favour in the sight of the pope; granted you to return home with the perfect accomplishment of your wishes; and has condescended, through you, to restore the holiest seat of our first teacher ² to its pristine dignity." I think it proper to subjoin part of the king's epistle and also of the pope's, though I may seem by so doing to anticipate the regular order of time; but I shall do it on this account, that it is a task of greater difficulty for me to blend together disjointed facts than to despatch those which I had begun.

⁶ Ethelberht, king of East Anglia, was put to death by Offa A. D. 793.

§ 88. ³ "To the most holy and truly loving lord Leo, ⁴ pontiff of the sacred and apostolical see, Kenulf, by the grace of God king of the Mercians, with the bishops, princes, and every degree of dignity under our authority, sendeth the salutation of the purest love in Christ.

“ We give thanks ever to God Almighty, who is wont by the means of new guides, the former being taken to the life eternal, to guide the church, purchased by his precious blood, amid the diverse storms of this world, to the haven of salvation, and to shed fresh light upon it, in order that it be led into no error of darkness, but may pursue the path of truth without stumbling. Wherefore the universal church justly rejoices, that, when the true Rewarder of all good men took the most glorious pastor of his flock, Adrian,¹ to be eternally rewarded in heaven, still his kind providence gave a leader to his sheep, not less skilled, to conduct the flock of God into the fold of life. We also, who live in the farthest confines of the world, justly boast, beyond all other things, that the church’s exaltation is our safety, its prosperity our constant ground of joy; since your apostolical dignity and our true faith originate from the same source. Wherefore I deem it fitting to incline the ear of our obedience, with all due humility, to your holy commands, and to fulfil, with every possible endeavour, that which it shall seem just to your piety that we should accomplish; but to avoid, and utterly reject, all that shall be found inconsistent with right. But now, I Kenulf, by the grace of God king, humbly entreat your excellence that I may address you, as I wish, without offence, on the subject of our progress, that you may receive me with peaceful tranquillity into the bosom of your regard, and that the liberal bounty of your benediction may qualify me, gifted with no stock of merit, to rule my people; in order that God may deign through your intercession to defend the nation, which, together with me, your apostolical authority has instructed in the rudiments of the faith, against all attacks of adversaries, and to extend that kingdom which He has given. All the Mercian kings before me were by your predecessors deemed worthy to obtain this benediction: this I humbly beg, and this, oh most holy man, I desire to receive, that you would more especially accept me as a son by adoption, as I love you as a father, and always honour you with all possible obedience. For among such great personages faith ever should be kept inviolate, as well as perfect love; because paternal love is to be looked upon as filial happiness in God, according to the saying of Hezekiah, [Isaiah xxxviii. 19,] ‘ A father will make known thy truth to his sons, O Lord:’ in which words I implore you, oh loved father, not to deny to your son, unworthy though he be, the knowledge of the Lord in your holy words, in order that by your sound instruction I may be enabled, by the assistance of God, to come to a better course of life. And moreover, oh most affectionate father, we beg, with all our bishops and every person of rank among us, that concerning the many inquiries on which we have thought it right to consult your wisdom, you would courteously reply, lest the traditions of the holy fathers and their instructions should, through ignorance, be misunderstood by us; but let your reply reach us in charity and meekness, that, through the mercy of God, it may bring forth fruit in us to perfection.

“The first thing our bishops and learned men allege is, that, contrary to the canons and papal constitutions enacted for our use by the direction of the most holy father Gregory, as you know, the jurisdiction of the metropolitan of Canterbury is divided into two provinces; to whose power, by the same father’s command, twelve bishops ought to be subject, as is read throughout our churches, in the letter which he directed to his brother and fellow-bishop, Augustine, concerning the two metropolitans of London and York, which letter I doubt not you also possess. But that pontifical dignity, which was at that time intended for London, with the honour and distinction of the pall, was for his sake removed and granted to Canterbury. For since Augustine, of blessed memory, who, at the command of St. Gregory, ministered the word of God to the nation of the Angles, and so gloriously presided over the church of the Saxons, died in that city, and his body was buried in the church of St. Peter the chief of the apostles, which his successor St. Laurence consecrated, it seemed proper to the sages of our nation, that the metropolitan dignity should reside in that city where rests the body of the man who planted the true faith in these parts. The honour of this pre-eminence, as you know, king Offa first attempted to take away, and to divide into two provinces, through enmity conceived against the venerable Lanbert¹ and the Kentish people; and your pious fellow-bishop and predecessor, Adrian, at the request of the aforesaid king, first did what no one had before presumed, and honoured the prelate of the Mercians with the pall. But yet we blame neither of these persons, whom, as we believe, Christ crowns with eternal glory. Nevertheless we humbly entreat your excellence, on whom God has deservedly conferred the key of wisdom, that you would consult with your counsellors on this subject, and condescend to transmit to us what you may think necessary for us to observe hereafter, so that the coat of Christ, woven throughout without seam, may not suffer any rent from dissensions among us, but may, as we desire, through your sound doctrine be guided into the unity of true peace. We have written these things to you, most holy father, with great humility and regard, earnestly entreating your clemency, that you would kindly and justly reply to those things which have been of necessity submitted to you by us. Moreover, we wish that you would examine with pious love that epistle, which, in the presence of all our bishops, Ethelard the archbishop wrote to you more fully on the subject of his own affairs and necessities, as well as on those of all Britain, that whatever the rule of faith requires in those matters which are contained therein, you would condescend truly to explain. Wherefore, during the last year, I sent my own embassy and that of the bishops by Wada the abbot, which embassy he receiving, executed idly, yea even foolishly. At this time I send you a small present as a token of regard, respected father, by Birin the priest, and Fildas and Cheolberth my servants, that is to say, one hundred and twenty mancuses² together with letters,

² The value of the mancus is doubtful. Sometimes it appears to mean the same begging that you would condescend to receive them kindly, and give us your blessing. May God Almighty long preserve you safe, to the glory of his holy church."

§ 89. "To the most excellent prince, my son, Kenulf king of the Mercians, of the province of Saxony, pope Leo sendeth greeting.

"Our most holy and reverend brother Ethelard, archbishop of Canterbury, arriving at the holy thresholds of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, as well for the faithful performance of his vow of prayer, as to acquaint us of the apostolic see with the cause of his consecration, hath brought to us the writings of your royal excellence, wherein finding, in two epistles filled with true faith, your great humility, we return thanks to Almighty God, who hath taught and inclined your most prudent excellence to have due regard with us in all things towards St. Peter the chief of the apostles, and to submit with meekness to all apostolical constitutions. Moreover, in one of these epistles we find that, were it requisite, you would even lay down your life for us, for the sake of our apostolical office; yea, you rejoice much in the Lord at our prosperity, and profess that when our letters of kindest admonition reach the ears of your cordiality, you will receive them with all humility and spiritual joy of heart, as sons do the gift of a father. It is added, too, that you had ordered a small present out of your abundance to be offered to us, an hundred and twenty mancuses; which sum, with ardent desire for the salvation of your soul, we have accepted. The aforesaid archbishop, with his attendants, has been honourably and kindly received by us, and has been supplied with every necessary assistance. In the meantime, trusting to your most prudent excellence, (since you observe, even in your own royal letters, that no Christian can presume to run counter to our apostolical decisions,) we therefore endeavour, with all possible diligence, to transmit and ordain what shall be of service to your kingdom, that, as a canonical censure enjoins your royal excellence, and all the princes of your nation, and the whole people of God, to observe all things which the aforesaid archbishop Ethelard our brother, or the whole body of the evangelical and apostolical doctrine, and that of the holy fathers and of our predecessors the holy pontiffs, ordain, you ought by no means to resist their orthodox doctrine in any thing, as our Lord and Saviour says in the gospel, 'He who receiveth you receiveth me, and he who receives a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward.' [Matt. x. 40, 41.] And how much more do we praise the Almighty, for this same lord archbishop, whom you have so highly commended to us, as being what he really is, most honourable and skilful, and that you know him to be prudent, of good morals, worthy before God and men. Oh, dearest and loving son, and excellent good king, at these your assertions we praise Almighty God, who hath pointed out to you a prelate who, like a true shepherd, is able to prescribe due penance according to the doctrine of the holy Scriptures, and to rescue the souls of those who are under his sacerdotal authority from the nethermost hell, snatching them from inextinguishable fire, bringing them into the haven of salvation, and offering for them to God Almighty a sacrifice fit and pure in the sight of the Divine Majesty. And since the aforesaid archbishop hath pleased us extremely in every respect, in all holiness and conversation of life, confiding much to him, we give him such episcopal power, by the authority of St. Peter the chief of the apostles, whose office, though unworthily, we fill, that if any in his province, as well kings and princes as people, shall transgress the commandments of the Lord, he shall excommunicate him until he repent; and if he remain impenitent, let him be to you as a heathen man and a publican. But with respect to the aforesaid Ethelard, now made archbishop of the church of Canterbury, since your excellent prelates have demanded from us that we do him justice concerning the diocesan jurisdiction which he lately held, as well over bishops as monasteries, and of which he has been unjustly deprived as you know, and which have been taken from his venerable see; we, making most diligent search, have found in our sacred depository that St. Gregory, our predecessor, delivered that diocese to his deputed archbishop, St. Augustine, with the right of consecrating bishops, to the full number of twelve. Hence, we also (the truth being ascertained) have, by our apostolical authority, ordination and confirmation, decreed that these be placed on their ancient footing, and do restore them to him entire: and we deliver to him the grant of our confirmation, to be duly observed by his church, according to the sacred canons."

§ 90. In the meantime Offa, that the outrages against his countrymen might not secretly tend to his disadvantage, seeking the friendship and conciliating the favour of neighbouring kings, gave his daughter Ethelburga in marriage to Brithric, king of the West Saxons.¹ He obtained the amity of Charles the Great, king of the Franks, by repeated embassies, though he could find little in the disposition of Charles to second his views: they had disagreed before, insomuch that violent feuds having arisen on both sides, even the intercourse of merchants was prohibited. There is an epistle of Alcuin to this effect, part of which I shall subjoin, as it affords a strong proof of the magnanimity and valour of Charles, who spent all his time in war against the Pagans, rebels to God.

§ 91. He says,²—"The Old Saxons,³ and all the nations of the Frisons, were converted to the faith of Christ, through the exertions of king Charles, who urged some with threats and tempted others with rewards. A year ago the king made an attack upon the Sclavonians, and subjugated them to his power. The Avars, whom we call Huns, made a furious attempt upon Italy, and being conquered by the Christian generals of the aforesaid king, returned home with disgrace. In like manner they rushed against Baugaria [Bavaria], and were again overcome and dispersed by the Christian army. Moreover, the princes and commanders of the same most Christian king took great part of Spain from the Saracens, to the extent of three hundred miles along the sea-coast; but, oh shame! these accursed Saracens (who are the Hagarens) have dominion over the whole of Africa and the larger part of Asia Major. I know not what will be our destination, for some ground of difference, fomented by the devil, has arisen between king Charles and king Offa, so that on both sides all navigation is prohibited to the merchants. Some say that we are to be sent into those parts to treat of peace."

§ 92. In these words, in addition to what I have remarked above, any curious person may determine how many years have elapsed since the Saracens invaded Africa and Asia Major. And indeed, had not the mercy of God animated the native spirit of the emperors of the Franks, the Pagans had long since subjugated Europe also. For, holding the Constantinopolitan emperors in contempt, they possessed themselves of Sicily and Sardinia, the Balearic isles, and almost all the countries surrounded by the sea, with the exception of Rhodes, Crete, and Cyprus: in our time, however, they have been compelled to relinquish Sicily by the Northmen; Corsica and Sardinia by the Pisans; and great part of Asia, and Jerusalem itself, by the Franks and other Christian nations of Europe. But as I shall have a fitter place to treat largely of these matters hereafter, I shall now subjoin, from the words of Charles himself, the treaty which was ratified between him and Offa, king of the Mercians:—

§ 93. ¹“ Charles, by the grace of God king of the Franks and Longobards, and patrician of the Romans, to his esteemed and dearest brother Offa, king of the Mercians, sendeth greeting.

“ First, we give thanks to God Almighty for the purity of the Catholic faith which we find laudably expressed in your letters. Concerning pilgrims, who for the love of God and the salvation of their souls wish to visit the residence of the holy apostles, let them go peaceably without any molestation; but if persons not seeking the cause of religion but that of gain, be found amongst them, let them pay the customary tolls in proper places. We will, too, that traders have due protection within our kingdom, according to our mandate; and if in any place they suffer wrongful oppression, let them appeal to us, or to our judges, and we will see full justice done. Let your kindness also be apprised that we have sent some token of our regard, out of our dalmatics² and palls, to each episcopal see of your kingdom, or of Ethelred's,¹ as an almsgiving on account of our apostolical lord Adrian;² earnestly begging that you would order him to be prayed for, not as though doubting that his blessed soul is at rest, but to show our esteem and regard to our dearest friend.³ Moreover, we have sent somewhat out of the treasure of those earthly riches which the Lord Jesus hath granted to us of his unmerited bounty, for the metropolitan cities; and for yourself, beloved, a belt, a Hunnish sword,⁴ and two silk palls."

§ 94. I have inserted these brief extracts from the epistle, that posterity may be clearly acquainted with the friendship which existed between Offa and Charles; confiding in which friendly intercourse, although assailed by the hatred of many, he passed the rest of his life in uninterrupted quiet, and left as his successor⁵ Egfert his son, who had been anointed king in his lifetime.⁶ Studiously avoiding the cruel path trod by his father, Egfert restored, with profound devotion, the privileges of all the churches which his father had in his time abridged. The possessions also which his father had taken from Malmesbury, he restored into the hands of Cuthbert, then abbot of that place, at the admonition of Ethelard archbishop of Canterbury, a man of energy and a worthy servant of God, and who is uniformly asserted to have been its abbot before Cuthbert.⁷ But while the hopes of Egfert's noble qualities were ripening, in his early years, untimely death cropped the flower of his youthful prime; on which account Albinus, writing to the patrician Osbert,⁸ says, "I do not think that the most noble youth Egfert died for his own sins, but because his father, in the establishment of his kingdom, shed much blood." Dying after a reign of four months, he appointed Kenulf, nephew of Penda in the fifth degree by his brother Kenwalk, to succeed him.⁹

§ 95. Kenulf was a man truly great, and surpassed his fame by his virtues, doing nothing at which malice could justly carp: religious at home, victorious in war, his praises will be deservedly extolled so long as an impartial judge can be found in England; equally to be admired for the extent of his power and for the lowliness of his

⁷ Some MSS. (A. D. L. M. followed by Saville) add, "from the circumstance of his choosing to be buried there."

mind, of which he gave an eminent proof in restoring, as we have related,¹ its faltering dignity to Canterbury,² little regarding earthly grandeur in his own kingdom at the expense of deviating from anciently enjoined canons. Taking up in succession Offa's hatred against the Kentish people, he sorely afflicted that province, and led away captive their king, Edbrith, surnamed Pren;³ but not long after, moved with feelings of pity, he released him: for at Winchelcombe, where he had built a church to God, which yet remains, on the day of its dedication he freed the captive king at the altar, and consoled him with liberty,⁴ thereby giving a memorable instance of his clemency. Cuthred,⁵ whom he had made king over the Kentish people, was present to applaud this act of royal munificence. The church resounded with acclamations, the street shook with crowds of people; for in an assembly of thirteen bishops and ten dukes, no one refused a largess; all⁶ departed with full purses. Moreover, in addition to those presents of inestimable price and number, in utensils, clothes, and select horses, which the chief nobility received, he gave to all who did not possess landed property⁷ a pound of silver; to each presbyter a manca of gold; to every monk a shilling; and lastly, he made many presents to the people at large. After he had endowed the monastery with such ample revenues as would seem incredible in the present time, he honoured it by his sepulture, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign.⁸ His son Kenelm, of tender age, and undeservedly murdered by his sister Quendrida,⁹ gained the title and distinction of martyrdom, and rests in the same place.

§ 96. After him, the kingdom of the Mercians declining, and, if I may use the expression, nearly lifeless, produced nothing worthy of historical commemoration. However, that no one may accuse me of leaving the history imperfect, I shall glance over the names of the kings in succession. Cheolwulf,¹⁰ the brother of Kenulf, reigning one year, was expelled in the second by Bernulf; who in the third year of his reign, being overcome and put to flight by Egbirht, king of the West Saxons,¹¹ was afterwards slain by the East Angles, because he had attempted to seize on East Anglia, as a kingdom subject to the Mercians from the time of Offa. Ludecan,¹² after two years' sovereignty, was dispatched by these Angles as he was preparing to avenge his predecessor. Withlac,¹ subjugated in the commencement of his reign by the before-mentioned Egbirht, governed thirteen years, paying tribute to him and to his son, both in his person and his property. Berthwulf,² reigning thirteen years on the same conditions, was at last driven by the Danish pirates beyond sea. Burhred,³ marrying Ethelswida, the daughter of king Athulf the son of Egbirht, exonerated himself by this affinity from the payment of tribute and the depredations of the enemy; but after twenty-two years, driven by them from his country, he fled to Rome, and was there buried at the school of the Angles, in the church of St. Mary. His wife at that time continuing in this country, but afterwards following her husband, died at Pavia.⁴ Then the kingdom was given by the Danes to one Chelwulf,⁵ an attendant of Burhred, who bound himself by oath that he would retain it only at their pleasure; after a few years it fell under the dominion of Elfred, the grandson of Egbirht. Thus the sovereignty of the Mercians, which prematurely bloomed by the overweening ambition of a heathen, altogether withered away through the pitiable inactivity of a dead-alive king, in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and seventy-five.

⁹ The legend of S. Kenelm will be given hereafter.

¹⁰ Ceolwulf, the paternal uncle of Cenelm, succeeded to the kingdom in the year 821, and was deposed by Beornwulf, a Mercian noble, A. D. 823.

¹¹ The battle between Beornwulf and Egberht was fought at Ellandune (supposed to be Wilton, near Salisbury) A. D. 824. Beornwulf was slain by the East Angles in the same year.

Of the Kingdom of the East Angles.

§ 97. As my narrative has hitherto treated of the history of the four more powerful kingdoms, I trust in a copious manner, as far as the perusal of ancient writers has enabled me to do so, it will now, as last in point of order, run through the governments of the East Angles and the East Saxons, as suggested in my preface; for the kingdom of the East Angles arose before that of the West Saxons, though posterior to the kingdom of Kent. The first⁶ and also the greatest king of the East Angles was Redwald, tenth in descent from Woden, as they affirm; for all the southern provinces of the Angles and Saxons on this side the river Humber, with their kings, were subject to his authority. This is the person whom I have formerly mentioned⁷ as having, out of regard for Edwin, killed Ethelfrid, king of the Northumbrians. Through the persuasion of Edwin, too, he was baptized; and afterwards, at the instigation

¹ Wiglaf was expelled from the throne of Mercia by Egberht A. D. 827, but was restored the following year; he died A. D. 839.

² Beorthwulf ascended the throne on the death of Wiglaf, A. D. 839. He was defeated by the Danes in 851, and died A. D. 852.

of his wife, abjured the faith.¹ His son Eorpwald embraced pure Christianity, and poured out his immaculate spirit to God, being barbarously murdered by the heathen Ricbert. To him succeeded Sigebert,² his brother by the mother's side, a worthy servant of the Lord, polished from all barbarism by his education among the Franks: for, being driven into banishment by Redwald, and for a long time associating with them, he had received the rites of Christianity, which, on his coming into power, he graciously communicated to the whole of his kingdom, and also instituted schools of learning in different places.³ This ought highly to be extolled, as men, heretofore uncivilized and irreligious, were enabled by his means to taste the sweets of literature. The promoter of his studies, and the stimulator of his religion, was Felix the bishop,⁴ a Burgundian by birth, who now lies buried at Ramsey. Sigebert, moreover, renouncing the world and taking the monastic vow, left the throne to his relation Egric,⁵ with whom, being attacked in intestine war by Penda, king of the Mercians, he met his death at the moment when, superior to his misfortunes, and mindful of his religious profession, he held only a wand in his hand. The successor of Egric was Anna,⁶ the son of Eni the brother of Redwald, involved in similar destruction by the same furious Penda; he was blessed with a numerous and noble offspring, as the second book will declare in its proper place.⁷ To Anna succeeded his brother Ethelhere, who was justly slain by Oswiu, king of the Northumbrians, together with Penda, because he was an ally to him, and was actually supporting the very army which had destroyed his brother and his kinsman. His brother Ethelwald⁸ in due succession left the kingdom to Aldulph⁹ and Elcwold,¹⁰ the sons of Ethelhere. Next came Beorna; after him Ethelred. His son

³ See Beda, E. H. § 199.

⁷ Malmesbury, § 68, gives an account of the three daughters of king Anna, Ethel-drith, Ethelburh, and Sexburh, and their descendants. See Beda, E. H. § 201.

⁸ Upon the death of his brother Ethelhere, in 655, Ethelwald ascended the throne. He died in 664.

¹⁰ Elcwold succeeded his brother Eadwulf, and died, according to Hickes, in 690. He was succeeded by Selraed, who died in 747, to whom Aelfuuald succeeded in that year, and died in 749. After him it seems that Hunbeanna and Alberht (called by Matthew of Westminster and others, Beorna and Aethelbert) conjointly reigned in East Anglia. Hickes makes Beorna and Aethelred succeed Elcwold in 690, and states that Beorna died before Aethelred; but the dates of both their deaths are unknown. The succession of the kings of East Anglia is involved in great obscurity.

was St. Ethelbert,¹ whom Offa, king of the Mercians, killed through treachery, as has already been said,² and will be repeated hereafter. After him, through the violence of the Mercians, few kings reigned in Eastern Anglia till the time of St. Edmund,³ and he was dispatched in the sixteenth year of his reign, by Hinguar, a heathen; from which time the Angles ceased to reign in East Anglia for fifty years. For the province was nine years without a king, owing to the continued devastations of the Pagans: afterwards, both in it and in East Saxony, Guthrum, a Danish king,⁴ reigned for twelve years in the time of king Alfred. Guthrum had for successor a Dane also, by name Eohric, who, after he had reigned fourteen years, was slain by the Angles because he conducted himself with cruelty towards them. Still, however, liberty beamed not on this people, for the Danish earls continued to oppress them, or else to excite them against the kings of the West Saxons, till Edward, the son of Alfred, added both provinces to his own West-Saxon empire, expelling the Danes and freeing the Angles, in the fiftieth year after the murder of St. Edmund, king and martyr, and in the fifteenth⁵ of his own reign.

Of the Kingdom of the East Saxons

§ 98. Nearly coeval with the kingdom of the East Angles was that of the East Saxons: which had many kings in succession, though subject to others, and principally to those of the Mercians. First, then, Sleda,⁶ the tenth from Woden, reigned over them, whose son, Sebert,⁷ nephew of Ethelbert king of Kent by his sister Ricula, embraced the faith of Christ at the preaching of Mellitus, first bishop of London; for that city pertains to the East Saxons. On the death of Sebert, his sons, Sexred and Seward, drove Mellitus into banishment;⁸ and soon after, being killed by the West Saxons,⁹ they paid the penalty of their persecution against

² See § 86.

³ Edmund, the direct descendant of the ancient kings of East Anglia, was crowned on Christmas-day, A. D. 854; and was slain by Inguar, a Danish prince, on the 20th of November in the year 870.

⁷ Saeberht, the son and successor of Sleda, began his reign in 597, and was converted to Christianity in 604. He died A. D. 616, and left his sons Sexred and Sigeward his successors.

Christ. Sigebert, surnamed the Little, the son of Seward, succeeding, left the kingdom to Sigebert,¹ the son of Sigebald, who was the brother of Sebert. This Sigebert, at the exhortation of king Oswiu, was baptized in Northumbria by bishop Finan,² and brought back to his nation, by the ministry of bishop Chedd,³ the faith which they had expelled together with Mellitus. After gloriously governing the kingdom, he left it in a manner still more glorious; for he was murdered by his near relations, merely because, in conformity to the gospel precept, he used kindly to spare his enemies, nor regard with harsh and angry countenance, if they were penitent, those who had offended him. His brother Swithelm,⁴ having been baptized by the same Chedd in East Anglia, succeeded. On his death, Sigher, the son of Sigebert the Little, and Sebbi, the son of Seward, held the sovereignty. Sebbi's associate dying before himself, he himself voluntarily retired from the kingdom in his thirtieth year, becoming a monk, as Beda relates.⁵ His sons Segehard and Seufred reigned after him. On their decease Offa, the son of Sigher, governed the kingdom for a short time;⁶ a youth of engaging countenance and disposition, in the flower of his age, and highly beloved by his subjects. He, through the persuasion of Kineswida, daughter of king Penda, whom he had anxiously sought in marriage, being taught to aspire after heavenly affections, went to Rome with Kenred, king of the Mercians, and the blessed Egwin, bishop of Wictians;⁷ and there being shorn, in due time he entered the heavenly mansions. To him succeeded Selred, son of Sigebert the Good,⁸ during thirty-eight years; who being slain, Swithed assumed the sovereignty of the East Saxons; but in the same year that Egbert king of the West Saxons subdued Kent, being expelled by him, he vacated the kingdom.⁹ Nevertheless London, with

² Finan, bishop of Lindisfarne, succeeded to that see on the death of Aidan in 651.

³ Cedd was ordained bishop of London about the year 656, and died A. D. 664. See Beda, E. H. § 214.

⁷ Egwin, bishop of Worcester, was consecrated A. D. 692, and sat till A. D. 717.

⁹ Here must be some defect in all the MSS., or some misconception in the mind of our author; for if Swithred succeeded upon the death of Swebriht in 738, or even after Selred of East Anglia was slain in 747, it is improbable that he was reigning when the Kentish men submitted to Egberht in the year 824. See the Appendix to Florence of Worcester, p. 395, upon a hasty inspection of which Malmesbury would seem to have founded his present statement.

the adjacent country, continued subject to the kings of the Mercians as long as they held their sovereignty.

Concerning the partition of the Kingdoms, and of the districts and sees of England.

§ 99. ¹The kings of Kent, it is to be observed, had dominion peculiarly in Kent, in which are two sees; the archbishopric of Canterbury, and the bishopric of Rochester.

§ 100. The kings of the West Saxons ruled in Wiltshire, Berkshire, and Dorsetshire, in which there is one bishop, whose see is now at Salisbury; formerly it was at Ramesbury, or at Shireburn. They also ruled in Sussex, which for some little time possessed a king of its own.² The episcopal see of this country was anciently in the sea-girt island of Selsey, as Beda relates,³ where also the blessed Wilfrid built a monastery; the bishop now dwells at Chichester. They ruled too in the counties of Southampton and Surrey, which have a bishop, whose see is at Winchester: also, in the county of Somerset, which formerly had a bishop at Wells, but now at Bath: and in Domnonia, now called Devonshire, and Cornubia, now Cornwall. At that time there were two bishoprics, one at Crediton, the other at St. Germans; now there is but one, and the see is at Exeter.

§ 101. The kings of the Mercians governed the counties of Gloucester, Worcester, and Warwick; in these is one bishop, whose residence is at Worcester: and in Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Staffordshire; these have one bishop, who has part of Warwickshire and Shropshire; his residence is at the city of Legions [that is, at Chester] or Coventry; formerly it was at Lichfelde: in Herefordshire; and there is a bishop, having half Shropshire and part of Warwickshire and Gloucestershire, whose residence is at Hereford: in Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Hertfordshire, half of Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire; which counties are under the jurisdiction of a bishop, now resident at Lincoln, formerly at Dorchester: and in Leicestershire and Nottinghamshire, of which the care in spiritual things belongs to the diocese of York; formerly they had their own bishop, whose seat was at Leicester.

§ 102. The kings of the East Angles had dominion over the county of Cambridge; there is a bishop, whose seat is at Ely: and over Norfolk and Suffolk; and there is a bishop whose see is at Norwich, formerly at Elmam or Thetford.

§ 103. The kings of the East Saxons ruled in Essex and half of ¹ This passage may be compared with Malmesbury's other work upon the English Bishops, under the head of the Bishops of the East Saxons.

² The history of this kingdom is not well authenticated. It is supposed to have been founded about the year 490 by Aelli, who came over to Britain in 477 with his three sons, Cymen, Wlenking, and Cissi. Aelli was succeeded by his son Cissi. The South Saxons were converted to Christianity by Wilfrid, bishop of York, in the reign of Ethilwath, A. D. 681. The kingdom of Sussex appears sometimes to have been tributary to Kent, and at others to Wessex, to which it was finally united by Egberht, A. D. 824 Hertfordshire, where there anciently was, and still remains, the bishopric of London.

§ 104. The kings of the Northumbrians governed all the country which is beyond the river Humber, as far as Scotland; and there were the archbishop of York, the bishops of Hexham, of Ripon, of Lindisfarne, and of Candida Casa.¹ Hexham and Ripon are no more; that of Lindisfarne is translated to Durham.

§ 105. Such were the divisions of the kingdoms, although the kings, according to the vicissitude of the times, now one, and then the other, would exceed their boundaries through their courage, or lose them by their indolence; but all these several kingdoms Egbricht subjugated by his abilities, and consolidated them into one empire, reserving to each their own laws. Wherefore since I have passed beyond his times, fulfilling my promise in a review of the different periods, I will here fix the limits of my first volume, that the various separate tracks of the different kingdoms may unite in the general path of the West Saxon empire.

PREFACE TO BOOK II.

HERE BEGINNETH THE PREFACE TO THE SECOND BOOK.

A LONG period has elapsed since, as well through the care of my parents as my own industry, I became familiar with books. This pleasure possessed me from my childhood; this source of delight has grown with my years: indeed, I was so instructed by my father, that had I turned aside from these to other pursuits, I should have considered it as jeopardy to my soul and discredit to my character. Wherefore, mindful of the adage, "Covet what is necessary," I constrained my early age to desire eagerly that which it was disgraceful not to desire. I gave, indeed, my attention to various branches of literature, but in different degrees. Logic, for instance, which gives arms to eloquence, I contented myself with barely hearing: medicine, which ministers to the health of the body, I studied with somewhat more attention: but having scrupulously examined the several branches of ethics, I bow down to its majesty, because it spontaneously unveils itself to those who study it, and directs their minds to moral practice: history more especially, which, by a certain agreeable recapitulation of past events, excites its readers, by example, to frame their lives to the pursuit of good, or to aversion from evil. When, therefore, at my own personal expense, I had procured some historians of foreign nations, I proceeded, during my domestic leisure, to inquire if anything concerning our own country could be found worthy of handing down to posterity. Hence it arose that, not content with the writings of ancient times, I began myself to compose; not, indeed, in order to display my learning, which is comparatively nothing, but to bring to light events lying concealed in the confused mass of antiquity. In consequence, rejecting vague opinions, I have studiously sought for chronicles far and near, though I confess I have scarcely profited anything by this industry; for, perusing them all, I still remained poor in information, though I ceased not my researches as long as I could find anything to read. However, what I have clearly ascertained concerning the four kingdoms, I have inserted in my First Book, in which I hope truth will find no cause to blush, though perhaps a degree of doubt may sometimes arise. I shall now trace the monarchy of the West Saxon kingdom, through the line of successive princes, down to the coming of the Normans: which, if any person will condescend to regard with complacency, let him in brotherly love observe the following rule: "If before, he knew only these things, let him not be disgusted because I have inserted them; if he shall know more, let him not be angry that I have not spoken of them;" but rather let him communicate his knowledge to me while I yet live, that, at least, those events may appear in the margin of my history, which do not occur in the text.

THE SECOND BOOK OF WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF THE KINGS OF ENGLAND.

BOOK II.

§ 106. My former volume terminated where the four kingdoms of Britain were consolidated into one. Egberht, the founder of this sovereignty, grand-nephew of king Ina by his brother Inegild,¹ of high rank in his own nation, and liberally educated, had been conspicuous among the West Saxons from his childhood. His uninterrupted course of valour begat envy; and as it is almost naturally ordained that kings should regard with suspicion whomsoever they see growing up in expectation of the kingdom, Brihtric, as before related,² jealous of his rising character, was meditating how to destroy him. Egbirht, seeing this, escaped to Offa, king of the Mercians. While Offa concealed him with anxious care, the messengers of Brihtric arrived, demanding the fugitive for punishment and offering money for his surrender. In addition to this, they solicited his daughter in marriage for their king, in order that the nuptial tie might bin^c them in perpetual amity. In consequence Offa,³ who would not give way to hostile threats, yielded to flattering allurements, and Egbirht, passing the sea, went into France;⁴ a ¹ Egberht was the son of Ealhmund, king of Kent, who was the son of Eafa, son of Eoppa, son of Ingild, the brother of Ini, king of Wessex. See § 116.

³ Offa could have had no immediate influence upon the expulsion of Brihtric, he having died A. D. 794.

⁴ The Saxon Chronicle states that, before Egberht was king, Offa of Mercia and Beorhtric of Wessex drove him into France for three years. Sax. Chron. A. D. 836.

circumstance which I attribute to the counsels of God, that a man destined to so great a kingdom might learn the art of government from the Franks; for this people has no competitor among all the western nations in military skill or polished manners. This ill-treatment Egberht used as a whetstone with which to rub off the rust of indolence,¹ to quicken the energy of his mind, and to adopt foreign customs, far differing from his native barbarism. On the death therefore of Brihtric, having returned to Britain, invited by frequent messages from his friends, he ascended the throne, at the earnest wish of his country, in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred, and in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of Charles the Great of France, who survived this event twelve years.² In the meantime Egberht, when he had acquired the regard of his subjects by his affability and kindness, first manifested his power against those Britons who inhabit that part of the island which is called Cornwall;³ and having subjugated them, he proceeded to make the Northern Britons,⁴ who are separated from the others by an arm of the sea, tributary to him. While the fame of these victories struck terror into the rest, Bernulf king of the Mercians, aiming at something great, and supposing it would redound to his glory, if he could remove the terror of others by his own audacity, proclaimed war against Egberht. Deeming it disgraceful to retreat, Egberht met him with spirit, and coming into action, Bernulf fled, being completely overthrown. This battle took place at Hellendun, A. D. 826.⁵ Elated with this success, the West Saxon extending his views, in

² Malmesbury has fallen into error (following however the Saxon Chronicle) in fixing the accession of Egbert to the year 800, whereas it did not occur until A. D. 802, in which year, as we know from undoubted authority, Brihtric died. The information here given respecting the reign of Charlemagne is, of itself, sufficient to detect the error, and at the same time to correct it. See Pagi, A. D. 802, §§ 19, 20. The commencement of the reign of Charlemagne is usually dated from the 24th September, A. D. 768, when he succeeded to a portion of the French monarchy; consequently the thirty-fourth year of his reign was completed in September 802, the year in which Egberht undoubtedly ascended the throne. He died on the 28th January, 814, having, as Malmesbury observes, survived Egberht's accession twelve years. See § 43.

⁵ MSS. A. D. E. M. support the text; 824, L; 825, C; Saville (probably a misprint) 806. The battle of Ellandune was fought A. D. 824, as one MS. correctly reads. The MS. followed in the text not only dates this battle two years later than the best authorities, but makes it also subsequent to an event which, even according to the statement in the text, it must have preceded. The subjugation of Kent by Egberht in 824 is there stated to have taken place in the twenty-fourth year of his reign; but according to the more correct computation, which places the commencement of Egberht's reign in January 802, the defeat of Beornwulf of Mercia, and the expulsion of Baldred from the throne of Kent, must both have occurred in the twenty-second year of Egberht's reign, A. D. 824. Malmesbury, however, adopting the year 800 as the date of Egberht's accession, incorrectly, though consistently with his statement, probably wrote and considered 824 to be the twenty-fourth regnal year of Egberht.

the heat of victory, sent his son Ethelwulf, with Alstan bishop of Shireburn and a chosen band, into Kent, for the purpose of adding to the West Saxon dominions that province, either grown indolent through long repose, or terrified by the fame of his valour.

§ 107. These commanders observed their instructions effectually: passing through every part of the country, and driving Baldred its king, with very little difficulty, beyond the river Thames, they subjugated to his dominion, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, Kent, Surrey, the South Saxons, and the East Saxons, who had formerly been under the jurisdiction of his predecessors. Not long after, the East Angles, animated by the support of Egberht, killed, by successive stratagems, Bernulf and Ludecan, kings of the Mercians.¹ The cause of their destruction was the perpetual incursions which they made, with their usual insolence, on the territories of others. Withlaf their successor, first driven from his kingdom by Egberht, and afterwards admitted as a tributary prince, augmented the West Saxon sovereignty.² In the same year the Northumbrians perceiving that themselves only remained, and were a conspicuous object, and fearing lest he should pour out his long-cherished anger on them, at last, though late, gave hostages and yielded to his power.³ Thus possessed of all Britain,⁴ the rest of his life, a space of nine years, passed quietly on, except that, nearly in his latter days, a piratical band of Danes making a descent, disturbed the peace of the kingdom.⁵ So changeable is the lot of human affairs, that he who first singly governed all the Angles, could derive but little satisfaction from the obedience of his countrymen, while a foreign enemy was perpetually harassing himself and his descendants. Against these invaders the forces of the Angles making a stand, Fortune no longer flattered the king with her customary favours, but deserted him in the contest; for when, during the greater part of the day, he had almost secured the victory, he lost the battle as the sun declined; however, by the favour of darkness, he escaped the disgrace of being conquered. In the next action, with a small force, he totally routed an immense multitude.⁶ At length, after a reign of thirty-seven years and seven months,⁷ he departed this

² Wiglaf, being expelled by Egberht A. D. 827, was restored in the following year, but held his kingdom only as tributary to the crown of Wessex.

⁶ At the battle of Hengston, in Cornwall, fought A. D. 835. See the Sax. Chron. ad an.

⁷ This is taken from the Saxon Chronicle, A. D. 836. See, however, the charter of king Egberht (Cod. Dip. Ævi Sax. No. cexl. p. 318), dated A. D. 838, and confirmed by his son Ethelwulf A. D. 839, which year is described as the first of his reign after his father's death. If the length of Egberht's reign be correctly stated here and in the Saxon Chronicle, his death could not have happened before life, and was buried at Winchester; leaving an ample field of glory for his son, and declaring that he must be happy, if he was careful not to destroy, by the indolence natural to his race, a kingdom which he himself had consolidated with such consummate industry.

Of King Ethelwulf.

§ 108. In the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and thirty-seven,¹ Ethelwulf (whom some call Athulf), the son of Egberht, came to the throne, and reigned twenty years and five months.² He was mild by nature, and infinitely preferred a life of tranquillity to dominion over many provinces; and finally, content with his paternal kingdom of the West Saxons, he bestowed all the rest which his father had subjugated on his son Ethelstan,³ of whom it is not known when⁴ or in what manner he died. He assisted Burhred,⁵ king of the Mercians, with an army against the Britons, and highly exalted him by giving him his daughter⁶ in marriage. He both personally and by his generals⁷ frequently overcame the piratical Danes, who were traversing the whole island and infesting the coast with sudden descents, although, according to the chance of war, he himself experienced great and repeated calamities; London and almost the whole of Kent being laid waste.⁸ Yet these disasters were ever checked by the alacrity of the king's advisers, who suffered not the enemy to trespass with impunity, but fully avenged themselves on them by the effect of their united counsels. For he possessed at that time two most excellent prelates, the blessed Swithun of Winchester,⁹ and Alstan of Shireburn,¹⁰ who perceiving the king to be of a heavy and sluggish disposition, perpetually stimulated him by their admonitions to the knowledge of governing.

August, A. D. 839. Simeon of Durham assigns thirty-six years only to the reign of Egberht, and Florence of Worcester states that he died in the thirty-seventh year of his reign. It is probable that these fluctuations originate in the uncertainty which prevailed as to the year in which this monarch's reign had its beginning. See p. 84, note ².

³ Ethelstan was made king of Kent, Essex, Surrey, and Sussex, by his father, in 839.

⁵ The incidents respecting Burhred occurred A. D. 853.

⁷ See the Sax. Chron. under the years 845 and 851.

Swithun, disgusted with earthly, trained his master to heavenly pursuits; Alstan, knowing that the business of the kingdom ought not to be neglected, continually inspirited him against the Danes, himself furnishing the exchequer with money, as well as regulating the army. Any peruser of the *Annals*¹ will find many affairs of this kind both entered on with courage, and terminated with success, through his means. He held his bishopric fifty years, happy in living for so long a space in the practice of good works: I should readily commend him had he not been swayed by worldly avarice, and usurped what belonged to others, when by his intrigues he seized the monastery of Malmesbury to his own use. We feel the mischief of this shameful conduct even to the present day, although the monastery has baffled all similar violence from the time of his death till now, when it has fallen again into like difficulty.² Thus the accursed passion of avarice corrupts the human soul, and forces men, though great and illustrious in other respects, into hell.³

§ 109. Confiding in these two supporters for the good management of the foreign and domestic concerns of his kingdom, Ethelwulf, after the subjugation of his enemies, turned to the establishment of God's worship, and granted the tenth of every hide of land within his kingdom to the servants of Christ, free from all tribute, exempt from all services.⁴ But how small a portion is this of his glory! Having settled his kingdom, he went to Rome, and there offered to St. Peter that tribute which England pays to this day,⁵ before pope Leo the fourth,⁶ who had also, formerly, honourably received, and anointed as king, Elfred⁷ his son, whom Ethelwulf had sent to him. Continuing there one whole year, he nobly repaired the school of the Angles,⁸ which, according to report, was first founded by Offa, king of the Mercians, and had been burnt down some time back. Returning home through France, he married Judith,⁹ daughter of Charles king of the Franks.

³ Virg. Æn. iii. 56.

⁴ See the charter itself, § 114.

⁷ This was probably towards the end of the year 854.

⁹ Ethelwulf's marriage with Judith, daughter of Charles le Chauve, took place at the palace of Verberie on the 1st (or the 7th) of October, 856. See Limier's Hist. Genealog. de France, p. 25.

§ 110. ¹For Lewis the Pious, ²son of Charles the Great, had four sons; Lothaire, Pippin, Lewis, and Charles, surnamed the Bald; of these Lothaire, even in his father's life-time, ³usurping the title of emperor, reigned fifteen years ⁴in that part of Germany situate near the Alps, which is now called Lorraine, (that is, the kingdom of Lothaire,) and in all Italy, together with Rome. In his latter days, afflicted with sickness, he renounced the world. He was a man far more inhuman than any of those who had preceded him; so much so, as even frequently to load his own father with chains in a dungeon. ⁵Lewis indeed was of mild and simple manners, but he was unmercifully persecuted by Lothaire, because Ermengarde, by whom he had his first family, being dead, he was doatingly fond of Charles, his son by his second wife Judith. ⁶Pippin, ⁷another son of Lewis, had dominion in Aquitaine and Gascony. Lewis, ⁸the third son of Lewis, in addition to Norica, which he had already, possessed the kingdoms which his father had given him, that is to say, Alemannia, Turingia, Austrasia, Saxony, and the kingdom of the Avars, that is the Huns. Charles ⁹obtained the half of France on the west, and all Neustria, ¹⁰Brittany, and the greatest part of Burgundy, Gothia, Gascony, and Aquitania; Pippin the son of Pippin being ejected thence, and compelled to become shorn as a monk in the monastery of St. Metard, ¹¹who afterwards escaping by flight, and returning into Aquitania, remained there in concealment for a long time; but being again treacherously deceived by Ranulf the governor, he was seized, brought to Charles at Senlis,

⁴ Lothaire died in the abbey of Pruim, in Ardennes, on the 29th Sept. 855, having taken the monastic habit only six days before.

⁵ The emperor Louis I. was twice confined by his sons in the monastery of St. Médard de Soissons; first in the year 830, and again in 833.

⁷ Pepin I. governed the kingdom of Aquitaine from the year 814, and died 13th December, A. D. 838.

⁸ Louis, brother of the emperor Lothaire, was made king of Bavaria A. D. 817; and died at Frankfort 28th of August 876.

¹¹ In 852 Pepin was made a monk in the monastery of St. Médard; but, having thence escaped back to Aquitaine in 855, he was betrayed by Rainulf, earl of Poitou, in 864, and brought to Charles le Chauve, who then confined him in the prison of Senlis, where he shortly after died.

and doomed to perpetual exile. Moreover, after the death of the most pious emperor Lewis, Lothaire, who had been anointed emperor eighteen years before his father's decease, being joined by Pippin with the people of Aquitaine, led an army against his brothers, that is, Lewis, the most pious king of the Bavarians, and Charles, into the county of Auxerre, to a place called Fontenai;¹ where, when the Franks with all their subject nations had been overwhelmed by mutual slaughter, Lewis and Charles ultimately triumphed, Lothaire being put to flight. After this most sanguinary conflict, however, peace was made between them, and they divided the sovereignty of the Franks, as has been mentioned above. Lothaire had three sons by Ermengarde,² the daughter of Hugo: first, Lewis,³ to whom he committed the government of the Romans and of Italy; next, Lothaire,⁴ to whom he left the imperial crown; lastly, Charles,⁵ to whom he gave Provence. Lothaire died in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and fifty-five, and the thirty-third year of his reign.⁶ Charles, his son, who on his death succeeded to the government of Provence, died in the eighth year of his reign.⁷ Then Lewis, emperor of the Romans, and Lothaire his brother, shared his kingdom of Provence.⁸ But Lewis, king of the Norici, (that is of the Bavarians,) the son of Lewis the emperor,⁹ in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and sixty-five, after the feast of Easter, divided his kingdom between his sons:¹⁰ to Carloman¹¹ he gave Norica, (that is Bavaria,) and the marches bordering on the Slavonians and the Lombards; to Lewis,¹² Thuringia, the Eastern Franks and Saxony; to Charles¹³ he left Alemannia and Curwalla, that is the county of Cornwall.¹⁴ Lewis himself reigned happily over his sons in full power for ten years, and then died in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and seventy-six, when he had reigned fifty-

² Hermengarde, daughter of count Hugh, was married to the emperor Lothaire in October, A. D. 821, and died 20th March, 851.

⁹ Louis the Pious.

¹⁰ This division in the year 865 is not mentioned by any other ancient French writer, with the exception of Hariulf, who probably derived his statement from the same source with Malmesbury, viz. the Chronicle of St. Wandregisile. The three sons of Louis, king of Bavaria, upon his death in 876, succeeded severally to his estates.

¹¹ Carloman, king of Bavaria, who died 22d March, 880.

¹³ Charles, king of Suabia, called Le Gros, subsequently became emperor of the West and king of France.

¹⁴ Literally, the Horn of Gaul, from the projection of Brittany.

four years.¹ Charles, king of the West Franks,² in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, entering Italy, came to offer up his prayers in the church of the apostles, and was there elected emperor by all the Roman people, and consecrated by pope John on the eighth of the kalends of January [25th Dec.], in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and seventy-five. Thence he had a prosperous return into Gaul. But in the thirty-eighth year of his reign, and the beginning of the third³ of his imperial dignity, he went into Italy again, and held a conference with pope John; and returning into Gaul, he died, after passing Mount Cenis,⁴ on the third of the nones of October [5th Oct.], in the tenth of the indiction, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and seventy-seven, and was succeeded by his son Lewis.⁵ Before the second year of his reign was completed, this Lewis died in the palace at Compeigne, on the sixth of the ides of April⁶ [8th April], in the twelfth indiction, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and seventy-nine. After him his sons, Lewis and Carloman, divided his kingdom.⁷ Of these, Lewis gained a victory over the Normans⁸ in the district of Vimeu,⁹ and died soon after, on the day before the nones of August [4th Aug.], in the year of our Lord eight hundred and eighty-one, the fifteenth of the indiction,¹⁰ having reigned two years three months and twenty-four days. He was succeeded in his government by his brother Carloman, who, after reigning three years and six days,¹¹ was wounded by a wild boar in the forest of Iveline, in Mount Ericus. He departed this life in the year of our Lord eight hundred and eighty-four, the second of the indiction, the eighth of the ides of December [6th Dec.]. Next, Charles king of the Suevi,¹² the son of Lewis king of the Norici, assumed the empire of the Franks and Romans in the year of the incarnate Word eight hundred and eighty-five, the third of the indiction, whose vision, as I think it worth preserving, I here subjoin.

³ Charles had not completed his second year. On 25th Dec. 875 he was crowned, and died 6th Oct. 877.

⁴ Charles is said to have been poisoned by his Jewish physician, Sédécias, 6th Oct. 877, at Brios, a village situate to the west of Mount Cenis.

⁵ Louis II. of France, and third of the empire, called Balbus, or Le Bègue, was crowned king at Compiègne, 8th Dec. 877, and emperor A. D. 878.

⁶ The best writers state that Louis le Bègue died at Compiègne on the 10th of April (quarto idus Aprilis), A. D. 879.

⁹ . . . in pago Vimuiaco.

¹⁰ Malmesbury follows Hariulf in placing the death of Louis III. of France on the 4th of August, A. D. 881; but it must be observed that the fifteenth indiction did not begin until the 25th of December, 881.

¹² Charles le Gros was crowned emperor of the West on Christmas-day, A. D. 880, and took possession of the kingdom of France on the death of Carloman, 6th Dec. 884, to the prejudice of Charles le Simple, posthumous son of Louis le Bègue. He was recognised as king of France about the end of January 885.

The Vision of Charles.

§ 111. ¹“ In the name of God most high, the King of kings ! As I Charles, by the free gift of God emperor, king of the Germans, and patrician of the Romans, and emperor of the Franks, on the sacred night of the Lord's day, after duly performing the holy service of the nocturns, went to the bed of rest, and sought the sleep of quietude, there came a voice to me, tremendously saying, ‘ Charles, thy spirit shall shortly depart from thee for a considerable time.’ Immediately I was rapt in the spirit, and he who carried me away in the spirit was most glorious to behold ; and in his hand he held a clue of thread emitting a beam of purest light, such as comets shed when they appear. And he began to unwind it, and said to me, ‘ Take the thread of this brilliant clue, and bind and tie it firmly on the thumb of thy right hand, for thou shalt be led by it through the inextricable punishments of the infernal regions.’ Saying this, he went before me, quickly unrolling the thread of the brilliant clue, and led me into very deep and fiery valleys, which were full of pits boiling with pitch, and brimstone, and lead, and wax, and grease. There I found the bishops of my father and of my uncles : and when I had asked them, in my terror, why they were suffering such dreadful torments ? they replied, ‘ We were the bishops of your father and of your uncles ; and instead of preaching, and admonishing them and their people to cultivate peace and concord, as was our duty, we were the sowers of discord and the fomenters of evil. On this account we are now burning in these infernal torments, together with other lovers of slaughter and of rapine ; and hither also will your bishops and ministers come, who now delight to act as we did.’ While I was fearfully listening to this, behold the blackest demons came flying about me, with fiery claws endeavouring to snatch away the thread of light which I held in my hand, and to draw it to them ; but, repelled by the rays of the clue, they were unable to touch it. Next running behind me, they tried to gripe me in their claws, and cast me headlong into those sulphureous pits ; but my conductor, who carried the clue, threw a thread of the clue over my shoulders, and doubling it, drew me strongly after him ; and in this manner we ascended lofty fiery mountains, from which arose lakes, and burning rivers, and all kinds of metals seething, wherein I found immersed innumerable souls of the vassals and princes of my father and brothers, some up to the hair, others to the chin, and others to the middle, who mournfully cried out to me, ‘ While we were living, we were, together with you and your father, and brothers and uncles, fond of battle, and slaughter, and plunder, through lust of earthly things: wherefore we now undergo punishment in these boiling rivers, and in various kinds of metal.' While I was with the greatest alarm attending to these, I heard some souls behind me crying out, 'The great will undergo still greater torment.' I looked back, and behold on the banks of the boiling river, furnaces of pitch and brimstone, filled with great dragons, and scorpions, and different kinds of serpents, where I also saw some of my father's nobles, some of my own, and of those of my brothers and of my uncles, who said, 'Alas, Charles, you see what dreadful torments we undergo on account of our malice and pride, and the evil counsel which we gave to our kings and to you, for lust's sake.' When I could not help groaning mournfully at this, the dragons ran at me with open jaws filled with fire, and brimstone, and pitch, and tried to swallow me up: but my conductor tripled the thread of the clue around me, which by the splendour of its rays overcame their fiery throats, and drew me along more firmly. And we descended into a valley, which was in one part dark and burning like a fiery furnace, but in another so extremely enchanting and glorious, that I cannot describe it. I turned myself to the dark part which emitted flames, and there I saw some kings of my race in extreme torture; whereupon being beyond measure distressed, I expected that I should be immediately thrown into these torments by some very black giants, who made the valley blaze with every kind of flame. Trembling very much, the thread of the clue of light assisting my eyes, I saw, on the side of the valley, the light somewhat brightening, and two fountains flowing out thence: one was extremely hot, the other clear and just warm; two large casks were there besides. When, guided by the thread of light, I proceeded thither, I looked into the vessel containing boiling water, and saw my father Lewis¹ standing therein up to his thighs. Dreadfully oppressed with pain and agony, he said to me, 'Fear not, my lord Charles, I know that your spirit will again return into your body; and God hath permitted you to come hither, that you might see for what crimes myself and all whom you have beheld, undergo these torments. One day I am bathed in the boiling cask; next I pass into that other delightful water; which is effected by the prayers of St. Peter and St. Remigius,² under whose patronage our royal race has hitherto reigned. But if you, and my faithful bishops and abbots, and the whole ecclesiastical order, will quickly assist me with masses, offerings, psalms, vigils, and alms, I shall shortly be released from this cask of boiling water: for my brother Lothaire and his son Lewis have had these punishments remitted by the prayers of St. Peter and St. Remigius, and have now entered into the joy of God's paradise.' He then said to me, 'Look on your left hand;' and when I had done so, I saw two very deep casks boiling. 'These,' said he, 'are being prepared for you, if you do not amend and repent of your atrocious crimes.' I then began to be dreadfully afraid. And when my conductor saw my spirit thus terrified, he said to me, 'Follow me to the right of that most resplendent valley of paradise.' As we proceeded, I beheld my uncle Lothaire sitting in excessive brightness, in company with glorious kings, on a topaz-stone of uncommon size, crowned with a precious diadem; and nigh him, his son Lewis crowned in like manner. Seeing me near at hand, he called me to him in a kind voice, saying, 'Come to me, Charles, now my third¹ successor in the empire of the Romans. I know that you have passed through the place of punishment where your father, my brother, is placed in the baths appointed for him; but, by the mercy of God he will be shortly liberated from those punishments, as we have been, by the merits of St. Peter and the prayers of St. Remigius, to whom God hath given a special charge over the kings and people of the Franks; and unless he shall continue to favour and assist the dregs of our family, our race must shortly cease both from reign and empire: know, moreover, that the rule of the empire will be shortly taken out of your hand, nor will you long survive.' Then Lewis, turning to me, said, 'The empire which you have hitherto held belongs by hereditary right to Lewis,² the son of my daughter.' So saying, there seemed immediately to appear before me a little child; and Lothaire his grandfather,³ looking upon him, said to me, 'This infant seems to be such an one as that which the Lord set in the midst of the disciples, and said, 'Of such is the kingdom of God; I say unto you, that their angels do always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven.' [Matt. xviii. 10.] But do you bestow on him the empire by that thread of the clue which you hold in your hand.' Untying, then, the thread from the thumb of my right hand, I gave him the whole monarchy of the empire by that thread; and immediately the entire clue, like a brilliant sunbeam, became rolled up in his hand. Thus, after this wonderful transaction, my spirit, extremely wearied and affrighted, returned into my body. Therefore let all persons know, willingly or unwillingly, forasmuch as, according to the will of God, the whole empire of the Romans will revert into his hands, and that I cannot prevail against him, compelled by the conditions of this my calling, that God who is the Ruler of the living and the dead will both complete and establish this, whose eternal kingdom remains for ever and ever. Amen."

§ 112. The vision itself, and the partition of the kingdoms, I have here inserted in the very words in which I found them. This Charles, then, had scarcely discharged the united duties of the empire and kingdom for two years,¹ when Charles, the son of Lewis who died at Compeigne, succeeded him.² This is the Charles who married the daughter of Edward king of England, and gave Normandy to Rollo³ with his daughter Gisla, who was the surety of peace and pledge of the treaty.⁴ To this, Charles, in the empire, succeeded king Arnulf,⁵ of the imperial line, tutor of that young Lewis of whom the vision above-recited speaks.⁶ Arnulf dying after fifteen years,⁷ this Lewis⁸ succeeded him, at whose death one Conrad,⁹ king of the Teutonians, obtained the sovereignty. His son Henry,¹⁰ who succeeded him, sent to Athelstan, king of the Angles, for his two sisters, Aldgitha and Edgitha, the latter of whom he married to his son Otho,¹¹ the former to a certain duke near the Alps.¹² Thus the empire of the Romans and the kingdom of the Franks being then and now severed from their ancient union, the one is governed by emperors, and the other by kings. But as I have wandered wide from my purpose, whilst indulging in tracing the descent of the illustrious kings of the Franks, I will now return to the course I had begun, and to Athelwulf.

¹ The emperor Lothaire was succeeded by his son Louis II, followed by Charles le Chauve, whom his son Louis III., called Le Bègue, succeeded; Charles le Gros was, therefore, fourth in succession from Lothaire.

² Louis, surnamed l'Aveugle, son of Boso, king of Provence, and Hermengarde, daughter of the emperor Louis II. Louis was living after the 6th of January, 923, having granted a diploma of that date in the 23d year of his empire. He died about the year 929.

³ The emperor Lothaire was great-grandfather of Louis l'Aveugle.

¹ Charles did not survive two years, and died on the 12th or 13th January, A. D. 888.

² Charles, called Le Simple, posthumous son of Louis le Bègue, was crowned king of France at Rheims, 27th Jan. 893. He married Eadgiva, daughter of Edward the Elder, king of England, A. D. 919; and had by her a son, afterwards Louis IV. king of France, called d'Outremer. He died in prison at Peronne, on the 7th Oct. A. D. 929.

⁴ In allusion seemingly to the name of Charles's daughter Gisle, i. e. "pledge."

¹² Consult the Preface to Ethelwerd upon this point.

bald his son, and Alstan bishop of Shireburn, and Enulf earl of Somerset, conspiring against him,¹ endeavoured to eject him from the sovereignty; but through the intervention of maturer counsel, the kingdom was divided between the father and his son. This partition was an unjust one; for malignity was so far successful that the western portion, which was the better, was allotted to the son, the eastern, which was the worse, fell to the father. He, however, with incredible forbearance, dreading "a worse than civil war," calmly gave way to his son, restraining, by a conciliatory harangue, the people who had assembled for the purpose of asserting his dignity. And though all this quarrel arose on account of his foreign wife, yet he held her in the highest estimation, and used to place her on the throne near himself, contrary to the West Saxon custom; for that people never suffered the king's consort either to be seated by the king, or to be honoured with the appellation of queen, on account of the depravity of Edburga,² daughter of Offa, king of the Mercians. She, as we have before mentioned,³ being married to Brihtric, king of the West Saxons, used to persuade him (a tender-hearted man, as they report) to the destruction of the innocent, and would herself take off by poison those against whom her accusations failed. This was exemplified in the case of a youth much beloved by the king, whom she poisoned in this manner; and immediately afterwards Brihtric fell sick and died, from having previously drank of the same potion, unknown to the queen. The rumour of this crime getting abroad, drove the poisoner from the kingdom. Proceeding to Charles the Great, she happened to find him standing with one of his sons; and after offering him presents, the emperor in a playful, jocose manner, commanded her to choose whom she liked best, himself or his son. Edburga choosing the young man for his blooming beauty, Charles replied with some emotion, "Had you chosen me, you should have had my son; but since you have chosen him, you shall have neither." He then placed her in a monastery, where she might have passed her life in splendour; but soon after, finding her guilty of incontinence, he expelled her.⁴ Struck with this instance of depravity, the Saxons framed the regulation I have alluded to, though Ethelwulf weakened it by his affectionate kindness. He made his will⁵ a few months before he died, in which, after the division of the kingdom between his sons Ethelbald and Ethelbirht, he set out the dowry of his daughter, and ordered that, till the end of time, one poor person should be clothed and fed from every tenth hide of his inheritance, and that every year three hundred mancass of gold should be sent to Rome, of which one hundred should be given to St. Peter, another to St. Paul for lamps, and the other to the pope for distribution. Dying two years after he came from Rome,⁶ he was buried at Winchester in the cathedral. But that I may return from my digression to my proposed series, I shall here subjoin the charter of ecclesiastical immunities¹ which he granted to all England.

§ 114. "Our Lord Jesus Christ reigning for evermore. Since we perceive that perilous times are pressing on us, that there are in our days hostile burnings, and plunderings of our wealth, and most cruel depredations by devastating enemies, and many tribulations of barbarous and Pagan nations, threatening even our destruction: therefore I Ethelwulf, king of the West Saxons, with the advice of my bishops and nobility, have established a wholesome counsel and general remedy; and I have decided that there be given unto the servants of God, whether male or female, or laymen,² a certain hereditary portion of the lands possessed by persons of every degree, that is to say, the tenth manse,³ but where it is less than this, then the tenth part; that it may be exonerated from all secular services, all royal tributes great and small, or those taxes which we call 'Witereden.'⁴ And let it be free from all things, for the release of our souls, and the obtaining remission of our sins, that it may be applied to God's service alone, exempt from expeditions, the building of bridges, or of forts; in order that they may the more diligently pour forth their prayers to God for us without ceasing, inasmuch as we have in some measure alleviated their service." Moreover it hath pleased Alstan bishop of Shireburn, and Swithun bishop of Winchester, with their abbots and the servants of God, to appoint that every congregation of brethren and sisters at each church, every week on the day of Mercury, that is to say, Wednesday, should sing fifty psalms, and every priest two masses, one for king Ethelwulf, and another for his nobility, consenting to this gift, for the pardon and alleviation of their sins; for the king while living they shall say, "O God, who justifiest;" for the nobility while living, "Stretch forth, O Lord:" after they are dead; for the departed king, singly; for the departed nobility, in common: and let this be firmly appointed for all the times of Christianity, in like manner as that immunity is appointed, so long as faith shall increase in the nation of the Angles. This charter of donation was written in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and fourteen,⁵ the fourth of the indiction, the fifth day of the nones of November [1st Nov.], in the city of Winchester, in the church of St. Peter, before the high altar; and they have done this for the honour of St. Michael the archangel, and of St. Mary the glorious queen, the mother of God, and also for the honour of St. Peter the chief of the apostles, and of our most holy father pope Gregory, and all saints. And then, for greater security, king Ethelwulf placed the charter on the altar of St. Peter; and the bishops received it in behalf of God's holy faith, and afterwards transmitted it to all churches in their dioceses according to the above-cited form.

⁵ 814, D. E. M.; 844; A. C. L. and Saville's text. But the date is incorrect, as it seems, in all the MSS., and proves the spurious character of the document. In the copy which is found in Ingulph, Burgred king of Mercia, and Edmund of East Anglia, are named as witnesses. The former ascended the throne A. D. 852; the latter was crowned on Christmas-day 854.

§ 115. From this king the English Chronicles trace the line of the generation of their kings upwards, even to Adam, as we know Luke the evangelist has done with respect to our Lord Jesus; and which perhaps it will not be superfluous for me to do, though it is to be apprehended that the utterance of barbarous names may shock the ears of persons unused to them.

§ 116. ¹Ethelwulf was the son of Egbirht, Egbirht of Elmund, Elmund of Eafa, Eafa of Eoppa, Eoppa was the son of Ingild the brother of king Ina, who were both sons of Chenred; Chenred of Chelwald, Chelwald of Cuda, Cuda of Cudwin, Cudwin of Cheaulin, Cheaulin of Chinric, Chinric of Cherdic, who was the first king of the West Saxons; Cherdic of Elesa, Elesa of Esla, Esla of Giwis, Giwis of Wig, Wig of Frewin, Frewin of Fridegar, Fridegar of Brond, Brond of Beldeg, Beldeg of Woden; and from him, as we have often remarked, proceeded the kings of many nations. Woden was the son of Fridewald, Fridewald of Frelaf, Frelaf of Finn, Finn of Godulf, Godulf of Geat, Geat of Teti, Teti of Beowi, Beowi of Sceld, Sceld of ²Sceaf, who, as some affirm, was driven on a certain island in Germany called Scandza (of which Jornandes,³ the historian of the Goths, speaks), a little boy in a skiff without an attendant, asleep with an handful of corn at his head, whence he was called Sceaf; and, on account of his singular appearance, being well received by the men of that country, and carefully educated, in his riper age he reigned in a town which was called Slawic, but at present Haitheby. That country, called Old Anglia, whence the Angles came into Britain, is situated between the Saxons and the Goths. Sceaf was the son of Heremod, Heremod of Stermon, Stermon of Hadra, Hadra of Gwala, Gwala of Bedweg, Bedweg of Streph, and he, as they say, was the son of Noah, born in the ark.

§ 117. In the year of our Lord eight hundred and fifty-seven, the two sons of Ethelwulf divided their paternal kingdom:⁴ Ethelbald reigned in West Saxony, and Ethelbirht in Kent. Ethelbald, base and perfidious, defiled the bed of his father by marrying, after his decease, Judith his step-mother.⁵ Dying, however, at the end

of five years,¹ and being interred at Shireburn, the whole government devolved upon his brother. In his time a band of pirates,² landing at Southampton, proceeded to plunder the populous city of Winchester; but soon after being spiritedly repulsed by the king's generals, and suffering considerable loss, they put to sea; and coasting round, chose the isle of Thanet, in Kent, for their winter quarters. The people of Kent giving hostages, and promising a sum of money, would have remained quiet, had not these pirates, breaking the treaty, laid waste the whole district by nightly predatory excursions; but for this reason they mustered a force, and drove out the truce-breakers. Moreover Ethelbirht, ruling the kingdom with vigour and with mildness, paid the debt of nature after five years, and was buried at Shireburn.³

§ 118. In the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and sixty-seven, Ethelred,⁴ the son of Ethelwulf, enjoyed his paternal kingdom for the same number of years as his brothers. Surely it was a pitiable and grievous destiny that all of them should perish by an early death; unless it be that, in such a tempest of evils, these royal youths should prefer an honourable end, rather than a painful government. Indeed, so bravely and so vigorously did they contend for their country, that the blame is not to be imputed to them that their valour did not succeed in its design. Finally, it is related that this king was personally engaged in hostile conflict against the enemy nine times in one year,⁵ with various success indeed, but for the most part victor, besides sudden attacks in which, from his skill in warfare, he frequently defeated those straggling depre-dators. In these several actions the Danes lost nine earls and one king, besides common people innumerable.

§ 119. One battle memorable beyond all the rest, was that which took place at Escendun: for the Danes having collected an army at this place, and divided it into two bodies—their two kings commanding the one, all their earls the other—the king Ethelred with his brother Elfred came upon them. It fell to the lot of Ethelred to oppose the kings, while Elfred was to attack the earls. Both armies eagerly prepared for battle, but, night approaching, deferred the conflict till the ensuing day. Scarcely had the morning dawned ere Elfred was ready at his post, but his brother, intent on his devotions, had remained in his tent; and

² The Danes plundered Winchester in the year 860.

⁴ Malmesbury, in placing the accession of Athelred in the year 867, is one year later than the Saxon Chronicle, Asser, and Florence of Worcester. Thorne adopts the same date as Malmesbury. If, however, the period assigned by Malmesbury to this reign, and that of Aethelberht his predecessor, be correct, Athelred must have ascended the throne about February 866, and died 23d April, 871.

when urged on by a message that the Pagans were rushing forward with unbounded fury, he declared that he would not move one step till his religious services were ended. This piety of the king was of infinite advantage to his brother, too impetuous from the thoughtlessness of youth, and already far advanced: for the battalions of the Angles were even now giving way, and bordering on flight, in consequence of their adversaries pressing upon them from the higher ground, for the Christians were fighting in an unfavourable situation, when the king himself, signed with the cross of God, unexpectedly hastened forward, dispersing the enemy and rallying his subjects: the Danes, terrified equally by his courage and the Divine manifestation, consulted their safety by flight. Here fell Osecg their king,¹ five earls, and an innumerable multitude of common people.

§ 120. The reader will not have failed to observe, that during this time the king of the Mercians and of the Northumbrians, eagerly seizing the opportunity of the arrival of the Danes, in contest with whom Ethelred was fully occupied, and recovering somewhat from their bondage to the West Saxons, had nearly regained their original power. All the provinces, therefore, were laid waste by cruel depredations, because each king chose rather to resist the enemy within his own territories, than to assist his neighbours in their difficulties; and thus preferring to avenge injury rather than prevent it, they ruined their country by their senseless conduct. The Danes acquired strength without impediment, whilst the apprehensions of the inhabitants increased, and each successive victory, from the addition of captives, became the means of obtaining another. The country of the East Angles, together with their cities and villages, was possessed by these plunderers; its king, St. Eadmund,² slain by them in the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and seventy,³ purchased an eternal kingdom by putting off this mortal life. The Mercians, often harassed, alleviated their afflictions by giving hostages. The Northumbrians, long embroiled in civil dissensions, made up their differences on the approach of the enemy. Replacing Osbirht their king, whom they had expelled,⁴ upon the throne, and collecting a powerful force, they went out to meet the foe; but being easily repelled, they shut themselves up in the city of York, which was presently after set on fire by the victors; and when the flames were raging to the utmost, and consuming the very walls, they perished for their country in the conflagration. In this manner Northumbria, possessed by right of war for a considerable time after, bewailed, through a sense of former liberty, the galling yoke of barbarians. And now Ethelred,⁵ worn down by numberless labours, died and was buried at Winburn.

² Edmund, king of East Anglia, was beheaded by Inguar, a son of Ragnar Lodbrok (or, according to some, a son of Ivar, and grandson of Ragnar), 20th Nov. 870.

³ So C. D. E. L. M. But A., followed by Saville's text, adds, "on the 12th of the kalends of December" [20th Nov.].

⁴ See at this point the narrative of Simeon of Durham.

⁵ He died 23d April, 871.

§ 121. In the year of our Lord's incarnation eight hundred and seventy-two,¹ Alfred, the youngest son of Ethelwulf, who had, as has been related,² before received the royal unction and crown from pope Leo the Fourth at Rome, succeeded to the sovereignty and retained it with the greatest difficulty, but with equal valour, for twenty-eight years and a half. To trace in detail the mazy labyrinth of his labours was never my design, because a recapitulation of his exploits in their exact order of time would occasion some confusion to the reader; for to relate how an hostile army, driven by himself or his generals from one part of a district, retreated to another, and, dislodged thence, sought a fresh scene of operation, and filled every place with rapine and slaughter; and to follow him, and if I may use the expression, to go round the whole island with him, might to some seem the height of folly: consequently I shall touch on all points summarily. For nine successive years battling with his enemies, sometimes deceived by false treaties, and sometimes wreaking his vengeance on the deceivers, he was at last reduced to such extreme distress—scarcely three counties, that is to say, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Somersetshire, standing fast by their allegiance—that he was compelled to retreat to a certain island called Adelingia, which from its marshy situation was hardly accessible. He was accustomed afterwards, when in happier circumstances, to relate to his companions in a lively and agreeable manner his perils there, and how he escaped them by the merits of St. Cuthbert; ³ for it mostly happens that men are pleased with the recollection of those circumstances which formerly they dreaded to encounter. During his retreat in this island, as he was one day in the house alone, his companions being dispersed on the river side for the purpose of fishing, he endeavoured to refresh his weary frame with sleep: and behold! Cuthbert, formerly bishop of Lindisfarn, addressed him while sleeping in the following manner:—“I am Cuthbert, if ever you heard of me: God hath sent me to announce good fortune to you; and since England has already largely paid the penalty of her crimes, God now, through the merits of her native saints, looks upon her with an eye of mercy. You too, so pitiably banished from your kingdom, shall shortly be again seated with honour on your throne, of which I give you this extraordinary token: your fishers shall this day bring home a great quantity of large fish in baskets; which will be so much the more extraordinary because the river, at this time rugged with ice, could warrant no such expectation, especially as the air, now dripping with cold rain, mocks the art of the fisher. But when your fortune shall succeed to your wishes, you will act as becomes a king, if you conciliate God your helper, and me his messenger, with suitable devotion.” Saying thus, the saint relieved the sleeping king of his anxiety; and comforted his mother also, who was lying near him and endeavouring to invite some gentle slumbers to her hard couch to relieve her cares, with the same joyful intelligence. Both awaking, they repeatedly declared that each had had the self-same dream, when the fishermen entering, displayed such a multitude of fishes as would have been sufficient to satisfy the appetite of a numerous army. Not long after, venturing from his concealment, he hazarded an experiment of consummate art. Accompanied only by one of his most faithful adherents, he entered the tent of the Danish king under the disguise of a mimic;¹ and being admitted, in his assumed capacity of jester, to every corner of the banqueting-room, there was no object of secrecy that he did not minutely attend to both with eyes and ears. Remaining there several days, till he had satisfied his mind on every matter which he wished to know, he returned to Adelngai; and assembling his companions, pointed out the indolence of the enemy, and the easiness of their defeat. All were eager for the enterprise, and himself collecting forces from every side, and learning exactly the situation of the barbarians from scouts whom he had sent out for that purpose, he suddenly attacked and routed them with incredible slaughter:² the remainder, with their king, gave hostages that they would embrace Christianity and depart from England,³ which they performed; for their king, Gudram,⁴ whom our people call Gurmund, with thirty nobles and almost all the commonalty, was baptized, Alfred standing sponsor for him. The provinces of the East Angles and Northumbrians⁵ were given up to him, in order that he might, under fealty to the king, foster with hereditary right what before he had overrun with predatory incursion. However, as the Ethiopian cannot change his skin, domineering over these tributary provinces with the haughtiness of a tyrant for eleven years, he died in the twelfth,⁶ transmitting to his posterity the inheritance of his disloyalty, until subdued by Ethelstan, the grandson of Elfred,⁷ they were, though reluctantly, compelled to admit one common king of England, as we see at the present day. Such of the Danes as had refused to become Christians, together with Hasteng,⁸ went over sea, where the inhabitants are best able

¹ Alfred succeeded to the throne A. D. 871, which he held for thirty years and six months. The twenty-eight years and a half, assigned to Alfred's reign by Malmesbury and the Saxon Chronicle, are insufficient to reach A. D. 901, the year to which Malmesbury correctly refers the death of Alfred, and the accession of Edward the Elder. Upon this portion of Malmesbury's History, the Life of Alfred by Asser should be consulted.

³ I. e. Wessex.

⁴ Guthorm was baptized at Aller, near Athelney, A. D. 878, and his baptismal name was Athelstan.

⁶ Guthorm died A. D. 891.

⁸ It has been doubted whether the chieftain, who at this time headed the Danes against Alfred, be the same Hasting who distinguished himself by the extent and cruelty of his ravages in France and the south of Europe during the reign of Charles le Chauve. This has been considered by some to be a son of the first to tell what cruelties they perpetrated; for over-running the whole maritime coasts to the Tuscan sea, they depopulated Paris and Tours, as well as many other cities seated on the Seine and Loire, those noble rivers of France. At that time the bodies of many saints being taken up from the spot of their original interment, and conveyed to safer places, have ennobled foreign churches with their reliques even to this day. Then also the body of St. Martin,¹ “venerated,” as Sidonius² says, “over the whole earth, in which virtue resides though life be at an end,” was taken to Auxerre by the clergy of his church, and placed in that of St. German,³ where it astonished the people of that district by unheard-of miracles. And when they who came thither, out of gratitude for cures performed, contributed many things to requite the labours of those who had borne him to this church, as is commonly the case, a dispute arose about the division of the money,—the inhabitants of Tours claiming the whole, because their patron saint had called the contributors together by his miracles; the natives, on the other hand, alleging that St. German was not unequal in merit, and was of equal efficacy; that both indeed had visibly the same power, but that the prerogative of their church preponderated. To solve this knotty doubt, a leprous person was sought, and placed, nearly at the last gasp, wasted throughout, and already dead as it were in a living carcase, between the bodies of the two saints. All human watch was prohibited for the whole night—the glory of Martin alone was vigilant; for the next day the skin of the man on his side appeared clear, while on that of German it was discoloured with its customary deformity. And that they might not attribute this miracle to chance, they turn the yet diseased side to Martin: but soon as the morning began to dawn, the man was found by the hastening attendants with all his skin smooth, perfectly cured, declaring the kind condescension of the resident patron, who yielded the honour to such a welcome stranger. Thus the inhabitants of Tours, both at that time and afterwards, safely filled their common purse by the assistance of their patron saint, till a more favourable gale of peace restored them to their former residence; for these marauders infesting France for thirteen years, and being at last overcome by the emperor Ernulf and the people of Brittany⁴ in many encounters, retreated into England as a convenient receptacle for their tyranny. During this space of time, Elfred had reduced the whole island to his power, with the exception of what adventurer. The elder Hasting, it is alleged, had been converted to Christianity, and, as a vassal of Charles le Simple, joined the royal army in the invasion by the Normans under Rollo in 898. The period of the departure of Hasting from England, after his final defeat by Alfred in 896, would not render this identity improbable.

the Danes possessed. The Angles had willingly surrendered to his dominion, rejoicing that they had produced a man capable of leading them to liberty. He granted London,¹ the chief city of the Mercian kingdom, to a nobleman named Ethered, to hold in fealty, and gave him his daughter Ethelfleda in marriage. Ethered conducted himself with equal valour and fidelity, defended his trust with activity, and kept the East Angles and Northumbrians, who were plotting rebellion against the king, within due bounds, compelling them to give hostages. Of what infinite service this was, the following emergency proved:—For after England had rejoiced for fourteen² years in the tranquillity of peace and in the fertility of her soil, then returned that northern pest of barbarians;³ again returned war and slaughter; again arose conspiracies among the Northumbrians and East Angles: but neither strangers nor natives experienced the same fortune as in former years. The one party, diminished by foreign contests, was less alert in their invasions; while the other, now experienced in war and animated by the exhortations of the king, was not only more ready to resist, but also to attack. The king himself, with his usual activity, was present in every emergency, daunting the invaders, and at the same time inspiring his subjects with the signal display of his courage: he would oppose himself singly to the enemy; by his own personal exertions he would rally his declining forces. The very places are yet pointed out by the inhabitants where he felt the full malevolence of misfortune, or was unbefriended by success. It was necessary to contend with Elfred even after he was overcome, after he was prostrate; insomuch that when he might be supposed altogether vanquished, “yet, like a slippery serpent, he would escape from the hand which held him,” glide from his lurking-place, and, with undiminished courage, spring on his insulting enemies; generally insupportable after flight, as becoming more circumspect from the recollection of defeat, more bold from the thirst of vengeance. His children by Egelsuitha,⁴ the daughter of earl Egelred, were Ethelsuida,⁵ Edward, who reigned after him; Ethelfleda,⁶ who was married to Ethelred earl of the Mercians; Ethelward,⁷ whom they celebrate as being extremely learned; Elfreda⁸ and Elfgiva,⁹ virgins. His health was so bad that he was constantly disquieted either by the piles, or some disorder of the intestines: it is said,¹⁰ however, that he entreated this from God in his supplications, in order that, by the admonition of pain, he might be less anxious after earthly delights.

§ 122. Yet amid these circumstances, the more retired life of the king is to be admired and celebrated with the highest praise. For although, as a certain one¹ has said, "Laws must give way amid the strife of arms," yet he, amid the din of war, enacted statutes by which his people might equally familiarise themselves with religious worship and military discipline. And since, from the example of the barbarians, the natives themselves began to lust after rapine, insomuch that there was no safe intercourse without a military guard, he appointed centuries, which they call "hundreds,"² and decennaries, which they call "tythings;" so that every Englishman, living according to law, must be a member of both. If any one was accused of a crime, he was obliged immediately to produce persons from his hundred and tything to become his surety; and whosoever was unable to find such surety must dread the severity of the laws. If any who had been impleaded made his escape, either before or after he had found surety, all persons of the hundred and tything paid a fine to the king. By this regulation he diffused such peace throughout the country, that he ordered that golden bracelets, which might mock the eager desires of the passengers while no one durst take them away, should be hung up on the public causeways, where the roads crossed each other. Ever intent on almsgiving, he confirmed the privileges of the churches as appointed by his father, and sent many presents over sea to Rome, and to St. Thomas³ in India. Sigelin, bishop of Shireburn, sent ambassador for this purpose,⁴ prosperously penetrated into India—a matter of astonishment even in the present time. Returning thence, he brought back many brilliant exotic gems and aromatic juices with which that country abounds, and a present besides, more precious than the finest gold,—part of our Saviour's cross, sent by pope Marinus⁵ to the king. He erected monasteries wherever he deemed it fitting; one in Adelingia,⁶ where he lay concealed, as has been above related, and there he made John⁷ abbot, a native of old Saxony; another at Winchester, which is called the New Minster, where he appointed Grimbald¹ abbot, who at his invitation had been sent into England by Fulco, archbishop of Rheims,² known to him, as they say, by having kindly entertained him when a child on his way to Rome. The cause of his being sent for was, that by his activity he might awaken the study of literature in England, which was now slumbering and almost expiring. The monastery of Shaftesbury³ also he filled with nuns, where he made his daughter Elfgiva abbess. From St. David's he procured a person named Asser,⁴ a man of skill in literature, whom he made bishop of Shireburn. This man explained the meaning of the works of Boethius, on the Consolation of Philosophy, in clearer terms, and the king himself translated them into the English language;⁵ and since there was no good scholar in his own kingdom, he sent for Werefrith, bishop of the Wiccians,⁶ out of Mercia, who by command of the king rendered into the English tongue the Books of Dialogues.⁷

⁴ This mission occurred in the year 883. The persons who then carried the king's alms to Rome and India are simply called in the Saxon Chronicle Sighelm and Ethelstan. Malmesbury here follows Florence, who considers that the Sighelm employed in this mission was a bishop of Sherborne, and that he succeeded to that dignity upon the death of Asser (faultily ascribed to A. D. 883). If Sighelm was bishop of Sherborne, he could not have been the successor of Asser, who died in A. D. 908 or 910.

At this time Johannes Scottus⁸ is supposed to have lived, a man of clear understanding and amazing eloquence. He had long since, from the continued tumult of war around him, retired into France to Charles the Bald, at whose request he had translated the Hierarchia of Dionysius the Areopagite,⁹ word for word, out of the Greek into Latin. He composed a book also, which he entitled Περὶ φύσεων μερισμοῦ, or Of the Division of Nature,¹⁰ extremely useful in solving the perplexity of certain indispensable inquiries, if he be pardoned for some things, in which he deviated from the opinions of the Latins through too close attention to the Greeks. In after time, allured by the munificence of Alfred, he came into England, and at our monastery, as report says, being pierced with the iron styles of the boys whom he was instructing, he was even looked upon as a martyr; which hesitating phrase I have not made use of to the disparagement of his holy spirit, as though it were matter of doubt, especially as his tomb on the left side of the altar, and the verses of his epitaph, record his fame. These, though rugged and deficient in the polish of our days, are not so uncouth for ancient times:—

“ Here lies a saint, the sophist John, whose days
On earth were graced with deepest learning's praise ·
Deem'd meet at last by martyrdom to gain
Christ's kingdom, where the saints for ever reign.”

§ 123. Confiding in these auxiliaries, the king gave his whole soul to the cultivation of the liberal arts, insomuch that no Englishman was quicker in comprehending, or more elegant in translating; and this was the more remarkable, because until twelve years of age¹ he absolutely knew nothing of literature. At that time, lured by a kind mother² under the mask of amusement, promising that he should have a little book which she held in her hand for a present if he would learn it quickly, he entered upon learning, in sport indeed at first, but afterwards drank of the stream with unquenchable avidity. He translated into English the greater part of the Roman authors, bringing off the noblest spoil of foreign intercourse for the use of his subjects; of which the chief books were, Orosius,³ Gregory's Pastoral, Beda's⁴ History of the Angles, Boethius⁵ Of the Consolation of Philosophy; his own book, which he called in his vernacular tongue "Handboc," that is, a hand-book.⁶ Moreover, he infused a great regard for literature into his countrymen, stimulating them both by rewards and punishments, allowing no ignorant⁷ person to aspire to any dignity in the court. He died just as he had begun a translation of the Psalms.⁸ In the prologue⁹ to "The Pastoral" he observes, "that he was incited to translate these books into English, because the churches which had formerly contained numerous libraries had, together with their books, been burnt by the Danes; and that the pursuit of literature had gone to decay almost over the whole island, because each person was more occupied in the preservation of his life than in the perusal of books: wherefore he so far consulted the good of his countrymen, that they might now hastily view, what hereafter, if peace should ever return, they might thoroughly comprehend in the Latin language; that he designed to transmit this book, transcribed by his order, to every see, with a golden style,¹⁰ in which was a mancus of gold; that there was nothing of his own opinions inserted in this or his other translations; but that everything was derived from those celebrated men Pleimund, archbishop of Canterbury, Asser the bishop, Grimbald and John the priests." But finally, briefly to elucidate his whole life, he so divided¹¹ the twenty-four hours which are constantly revolving by day and by night, as to employ eight of them in writing, in reading, and in prayer; eight in the refreshment of his body; and eight in despatching the business of the realm. There was in his chapel a candle with twenty-four divisions, and an attendant, whose peculiar province it was to admonish the king of his several duties by its consumption. One half portion of all revenues, provided they were justly acquired, he gave to his monasteries;¹² all his other income he divided into two equal parts. The first was again subdivided into three, of which the first was given to the servants of his court; the second to artificers, whom he constantly employed in the erection of new edifices, in a manner surprising and hitherto unknown to the English; the third he gave to strangers. The second part of the revenue was divided in such a mode that the first portion should be given to the poor of his kingdom, the second to the monasteries, the third to scholars, the fourth to foreign churches. He was a strict inquirer into the sentences passed by his magistrates, and a severe corrector of such as were unjust.¹ He had one unusual and unheard-of custom, which was, that he always carried in his bosom² a book in which the daily order of the Psalms was contained, for the purpose of carefully perusing it, if at any time he had leisure. In this way he passed his life, much respected by neighbouring princes; and he gave his daughter Ethelwitha³ in marriage to Baldwin, earl of Flanders, by whom he had Ernulf and Adolf. The latter received from his father the county of Boulogne; from the other are descended the present earls of Flanders.⁴

§ 124. Elfred paying the debt of nature,⁵ was buried at Winchester, in the monastery which he had founded, to build the offices of which, Edward his son purchased a sufficient space of ground from the then bishop and canons, giving for every foot a mancus of gold of the statute weight. The endurance of the king was astonishing, in suffering such a sum to be extorted from him; but he did not choose to offer a sacrifice to God from the robbery of the poor. These two churches were so contiguous that, when singing, they heard each other's voices: on this and other accounts, an unhappy jealousy was daily stirring up causes of dissension, which produced frequent injuries on either side. For this reason that monastery was lately removed out of the city, and became a more healthy as well as a more conspicuous place of residence. They report that Elfred was first buried in the cathedral, because his monastery was unfinished; but that afterwards, on account of the folly of the canons, asserting that the royal¹ spirit, resuming its carcase, wandered nightly through the buildings, Edward, his son and successor, removed the remains of his father, and gave them a quiet resting-place in the New Minster.² These and similar superstitions, such as that the dead body of a wicked man runs about after death by the agency of the devil, the English hold with almost inbred credulity,³ borrowing them from the heathens, according to the expression of Virgil,⁴—

“Forms such as flit, they say, when life is gone.”

§ 125. In the year of our Lord's incarnation nine hundred and one, Edward the son of Elfred succeeded to the government, and held it twenty-three years⁵—much inferior to his father in literature, but greatly excelling him in extent of power; for Elfred indeed united the two kingdoms of the Mercians and West Saxons, holding that of the Mercians only nominally, as he had assigned it to prince Ethered. But, at Ethered's death,⁶ Edward first brought the Mercians altogether under his power; next, the West⁷ and East Angles and Northumbrians, who had become one nation with the Danes; the Scots, who inhabit the northern part of the island, and all the Britons, whom we call Welsh, after perpetual battles; nor did he suffer one defeat. He devised a mode of frustrating the incursions of the Danes: for, repairing many ancient cities, or building new ones in places calculated for his purpose, he filled them with a military force, sufficient to protect the inhabitants and to repel the enemy. Nor was his design unsuccessful; for the inhabitants became so extremely valorous in these contests, that if they heard of an enemy approaching, they rushed out to give them battle, even without consulting the king or his generals, and constantly surpassed them both in number and in warlike skill. Thus the enemy became an object of contempt to the soldiery, and of derision to the king. At last some fresh assailants, who had come over under the command of Aethelwold, the son of the king's uncle,⁸ were all, together with himself, cut off to a man; those who had previously settled in the country being either destroyed, or spared under the denomination of Angles. Aethelwold, indeed, had attempted many things in the earlier days of this king, and disdained subjection to him, declaring himself his inferior neither in birth nor valour; but being driven into exile by the nobility, who had sworn allegiance to Edward, he brought over the pirates; with whom ⁵ Edward the Elder was not crowned till Whitsunday (16th May), A. D. 902; if, therefore, the commencement of his reign be dated from that day, he was yet in his twenty-third year when he died; but he had completed his twenty-third year, computed from his father's death, on 26th of October, A. D. 924. He died at Faringdon, probably before the close of that year, but certainly before the 30th of January, A. D. 925.

⁷ Meaning probably the people of Essex, or East Saxons.

meeting his death, as I have related, he gave proof of the folly of resisting our superiors in power. Although Edward may be deservedly praised for these transactions, yet, in my opinion, the palm should be more especially given to his father, who certainly laid the foundation of this extent of dominion. And here, indeed, Ethelfleda,¹ sister of the king and widow of Ethered, ought not to be forgotten, as she was a powerful accession to his party, the delight of his subjects, the dread of his enemies; a woman of an enlarged soul, who, from the difficulty experienced in her first (or rather only) labour, ever after refused the embraces of her husband, protesting that it was unbecoming the daughter of a king to give way to a delight, which after a time produced such painful consequences. This spirited heroine assisted her brother greatly with her advice; she was of equal service in building cities, nor could you easily discern whether it were more owing to fortune or her own exertions, that a woman should be able to protect men at home, and to intimidate them abroad. She died five years before her brother,² and was buried in the monastery of St. Peter at Gloucester, which, in conjunction with her husband Ethered, she had erected with great solicitude: thither, too, she had transferred the bones of St. Oswald the king from Bardney; but this monastery being destroyed in succeeding time by the Danes, Aldred, archbishop of York,³ founded another, which is now the chief in that city.

Concerning the Children of Edward the Elder.

§ 126. As the king had many daughters, he gave Edgifa to Charles⁴ king of the Franks, the son of Louis,⁵ son of Charles the Bald, whose daughter, as I have repeatedly observed,⁶ Ethelwulf had married on his return from Rome; and, as the opportunity has now presented itself, the indulgent reader will not think it irrelevant if I state the names of his wives and children. By Egwinna, an illustrious lady, he had Ethelstan⁷ his first-born, and a daughter of whose name I find no written record,⁸ but her brother gave her in marriage to Sihtric, king of the Northumbrians. The second son of Edward was Ethelward,⁹ by Elfleda, daughter of earl Ethelm;

³ Aldred, bishop of Worcester in 1046, after the death of archbishop Kinsinus was appointed to York, A. D. 1061, to hold both sees together; but the pope refused him the pall until he had given up Worcester. (Malmes. in Vita S. Wulstani.) He died 11th of September, 1069.

⁶ See § 109, and § 113.

⁷ Egwinna, the mother of king Ethelstan, is said to have been Edward's concubine; but Malmesbury speaks doubtfully of this alleged stain on Ethelstan's birth. See § 131.

⁹ Ethelward died at Oxford a few days after his father, and was buried at Winchester. See § 131.

deeply versed in literature, much resembling his grandfather Elfred in features and disposition, but swept off by death soon after his father. By the same wife he had Edwin, of whose fate what the received opinion is I shall hereafter describe,¹ not with confidence, but doubtingly. By her, too, he had six daughters: Edfleda, Edgiva, Ethelhilda, Æthilda, Edgitha, Elfgiva: the first and third, vowing celibacy to God, renounced the pleasure of earthly nuptials—Edfleda in a religious, and Ethelhilda in a lay habit; they both lie buried near their mother at Wilton. Her father gave Edgiva, as I have mentioned, to king Charles:² and her brother Ethelstan gave Ethilda to Hugh:³ this same brother also sent Edgitha and Elfgiva to Henry emperor of Germany, the second of whom he gave to his son Otho, the other to a certain duke near the Alps.⁴ Again, by his third wife named Edgiva he had two sons, Edmund and Edred, each of whom reigned after Ethelstan; two daughters, Edburga and Edgiva. Edburga, a virgin dedicated to Christ, lies buried at Winchester; Edgiva, a lady of incomparable beauty, was united by her brother Ethelstan to Lewis prince of Aquitaine.⁵ Edward had brought up his daughters in such wise that in childhood they gave their whole attention to literature, and afterwards employed themselves in the labours of the distaff and the needle, that thus they might chastely pass their virgin age; and his sons were so educated as first to have the completest benefit of learning, that afterwards they might succeed to govern the state, not like rustics, but philosophers.

Of the Normans, how they infested France, and how Rollo took the Daughter of the King of the Franks.

§ 127. Charles, the son-in-law of Edward, constrained thereto by Rollo through a succession of calamities, conceded to him that part of Gaul which at present is called Normandy. It would be tedious to relate, for how many years, and with what audacity, the Normans disquieted every place from the British ocean, as I have before mentioned,⁶ to the Tuscan sea. First Hasteng, and then Rollo, who, born of noble lineage among the Norwegians,⁷ though obsolete from its extreme antiquity, was banished by the king's command from his own country,⁸ and brought over with him multitudes, who were in danger either from debt or consciousness of guilt, and whom he had allured by great expectations of advantage. Betaking himself therefore to piracy, after his cruelty had ranged on every side at pleasure, he experienced a check at Chartres:¹ for the townspeople, relying neither on arms nor fortifications, piously implored the assistance of the blessed Virgin² Mary. The shift too of the Virgin, which Charles the Bald had brought with other reliques from Constantinople,³ they displayed to the winds, on the ramparts thronged by the garrison, after the fashion of a banner. The enemy on seeing it began to laugh, and to direct their arrows at it through the air: this, however, was not done with impunity; for presently their eyes becoming dim, they could neither retreat nor advance. The townsmen with joy perceiving this, indulged themselves in a plentiful slaughter of them as far as fortune permitted. Rollo, however, whom God reserved for the true faith, escaped, and soon after gained Rouen and the neighbouring cities by force of arms, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and seventy-six,⁴ and one year before the death of Charles the Bald, whose grandson Lewis,⁵ as is before mentioned,⁶ vanquished the Normans, but did not expel them: but Charles,⁷ the brother of that Lewis, grandson of Charles the Bald by his son Lewis, as I have said above,⁸ repeatedly experiencing from unsuccessful conflicts, that fortune gave him nothing which she took from others, resolved, after consulting his nobility, that it was advisable to make a show of royal munificence, when he was unable to repel injury; and, in a friendly manner, sent for Rollo. He was at this time far advanced in years, and consequently easily inclined to adopt pacific measures. It was therefore determined by treaty,⁹ that he should be baptized, and hold that country of the king as his lord. The inbred and untameable ferocity of the man may well be imagined; for, on receiving this gift, as the bye-standers suggested to him that he ought to kiss the foot of his benefactor,¹⁰ disdainingly to kneel down, he seized the king's foot, and dragged it to his mouth as he stood erect. The king falling on his back, the Normans began to laugh, and the Franks to reprobate the transaction; but Rollo apologised for his shameful conduct, by saying that it was the custom of his country. Thus, the affair being settled, Rollo returned to Rouen, and there died.¹¹

⁹ The terms of this treaty, it is believed, nowhere exist in an authentic form, and it is even very questionable if it ever were reduced to writing.

¹¹ Rollo abdicated in favour of his son William in the year 927. He died A. D. 931. (Bouquet, ix. 12, note.)

Concerning Hugh Capet, how he was made King of France.

§ 128. The son of this Charles was Lewis :¹ he, being challenged by one Isambard,² who, turning Pagan, had renounced his faith, called upon his nobility for their assistance. They not even deigning an answer, one Hugh, son of Robert earl of Mont Didier, a youth of no great celebrity at the time, voluntarily entered the lists for his lord, and killed the challenger.³ Lewis with his whole army pursuing to Ponthieu, gained there a glorious triumph, either destroying or putting to flight all the barbarians whom Isambard had brought with him. But not long after, weakened by extreme sickness, the consequence of this laborious expedition, he appointed this Hugh, a young man of noted faith and courage, heir to the kingdom. Thus the lineage of Charles the Great ceased with him, because either his wife was barren, or else did not live long enough to have issue. Hugh married one of the daughters of Edward,⁴ and begot Rodbert;⁵ Rodbert, Henry; Henry, Philip; Philip, Lewis, who now reigns in France.⁶ But to return to our Edward; I think it will be pleasing to relate what in his time pope Formosus commanded to be done with respect to filling up the bishoprics, which I shall insert in the very words I found it.⁷

§ 129. In the year of our Lord's nativity nine hundred and four, pope Formosus sent letters into England, by which he denounced excommunication and malediction upon king Edward and all his subjects, instead of the benediction which St. Gregory had given to the English nation from the seat of St. Peter; because for seven whole years the entire district of the Gewisi, that is, of the West Saxons, had been destitute of bishops. On hearing this, king Edward assembled a council of the senators of the English, over which presided archbishop Pleimund,⁸ interpreting carefully the words of the apostolic legation. Then the king and the bishops chose for themselves and their followers a salutary counsel, and, according to our Saviour's words, "The harvest truly is plenteous,

² The events detailed in this section are greatly confounded. What is here related of Louis IV. appears to belong to the reign of his uncle, Louis III.

³ This statement is unsupported by satisfactory authority.

⁵ He died at Vitry, near Paris, on the 4th of August, A. D. 1060.

⁶ Louis VI, surnamed Le Gros, was consecrated at Orleans, 3d of August, 1108, by the archbishop of Sens; and died at Paris, 1st of August, 1137.

but the labourers are few," [Matt. ix. 37,] they elected and appointed one bishop to every province of the Gewisi; and that district which two had formerly possessed, they now divided into five. The council being dissolved, the archbishop went to Rome with splendid presents, appeased the pope with much humility, and related the king's ordinance, which gave the pontiff great satisfaction. Returning home, in one day he ordained in the city of Canterbury seven bishops to seven churches; Fridestan to the church of Winchester, Adelstan to that of Cornwall, Werstan to that of Shireburn, Adelem to that of Wells, Edulf to that of Crediton. Also to other provinces he appointed two bishops; to the South Saxons, Bernegus, a very proper person, and to the Mercians, Chenulf, whose see was at the city of Dorchester. All this the pope established in such wise, that he who should invalidate this decree should be damned everlastingly.

§ 130. Edward going the way of all flesh, rested in the same monastery with his father, which he too had augmented with considerable revenues, and in which he had buried his brother Adelward four years before.¹

Of Ethelstan, the son of Edward.

§ 131. In the year of our Lord's incarnation nine hundred and twenty-four, Ethelstan the son of Edward began to reign, and he reigned sixteen years.² His brother Elward dying a few days after his father, had been buried with him at Winchester. At this place, therefore, Ethelstan being elected king by the unanimous consent of the nobility, he was crowned at a royal town which is called Kingston; though one Elvred, whose death we shall hereafter relate in the words of the king,³ with his factious party, (as sedition never wants adherents,) attempted to prevent it. The ground of this opposition, as they affirm, was that Ethelstan was born of a concubine; but having nothing ignoble in him except this stain, if after all it be true,⁴ he cast all his predecessors into the shade by his piety, as well as the glory of all their triumphs by the splendour of his own. So much more excellent is it that the qualities for which we are renowned should be inherent, rather than derived from our ancestors; because the former is exclusively our own—the latter may be imputed to others. I forbear relating how many new and magnificent monasteries he founded; but I will not conceal that there was scarcely an old one in England which he did not embellish either with buildings, or ornaments, or books,⁵ or ¹ Ethelward, youngest son of king Alfred, died 16th of October, A. D. 922, rather more than two years before the death of his brother Edward.

² Malmesbury, Florence of Worcester, and the Saxon Chronicle, place the death of Ethelstan in the year 940; but if, as also stated by Florence (p. 242), this event be referred to Wednesday, 27th of October, Indict. xiv., his death must have occurred A. D. 941, before he had completed the seventeenth year of his reign. Yet there occur many charters dated in 940, and attested by Edmund as king. See Cod. Dipl. Nos. 379, 384—388. ³ See §§ 136, 137.

possessions. Thus he ennobled the new ones expressly, but the old as though they were only casual objects of his kindness. With Sihtric, king of the Northumbrians, who married¹ one of his sisters, he made a lasting covenant; he dying after a year,² Ethelstan took that province under his own government, expelling one Aldulf,³ who resisted him. And as a noble mind, when once roused, aspires to greater things, he compelled Judwal, king of the Welsh, and Constantine, king of the Scots, to quit their kingdoms.⁴ But not long after, moved with commiseration, he restored them to their original state, that they might reign under him; saying, "it was more glorious to make a king than to be a king." His last contest was with Analaf, the son of Sihtric,⁵ who, with the before-named Constantine, again in a state of rebellion, had entered his territories under the hope of gaining the kingdom. Ethelstan purposely retreating, that he might derive great honour from vanquishing his furious assailant, this bold youth, meditating unlawful conquests, had now proceeded far into England, when he was opposed at Brunefeld⁶ by the most experienced generals and most valiant forces. Perceiving, at length, what danger overhung him, he assumed the character of a spy, and laying aside the badges of his royalty, and taking a harp in his hand, he proceeded to our king's tent. Singing before the entrance, and at times touching the trembling strings in harmonious cadence, he was readily admitted; professing himself a minstrel who procured his daily sustenance by such employment. Here he entertained the king and his companions for some time with his musical performance, carefully examining everything while he was occupied in singing. When satiety of eating had put an end to their sensual enjoyments, and the business of war was resumed among the nobles, he was ordered to depart, and received the recompense of his song; but disdainingly taking it away, he hid it beneath him in the earth. This circumstance was remarked by a person who had formerly served under him, and immediately related to Ethelstan. The king blaming him extremely for not having detected his enemy as he stood before them, received this answer, "The same oath which I have lately sworn to you, O king, I formerly made to Analaf: and had you seen me violate it towards him, you might have expected that I would have been guilty of similar perfidy towards yourself. But condescend to listen to the advice of your servant, which is that you should remove your tent hence; and remaining in another place till the residue of the army come up, you will destroy your ferocious enemy by a moderate delay." Approving this admonition, he removed to another place. In the night, Anlaf advancing well prepared, put to death, together with the whole of his followers, a certain bishop¹ who had joined the army only the evening before, and, ignorant of what had passed, had pitched his tent there on account of the level turf. Proceeding further, he found the king himself equally unprepared; who, little expecting that his enemy was capable of such an attack, had fallen into profound repose. But, when roused from his couch by the excessive tumult, and urging his people, as much as the night season would permit, to the conflict, his sword fell by chance from the sheath; upon which, while all things were filled with dread and blind confusion, he invoked the protection of God, and of St. Aldelm, who was distinctly related to him; and replacing his hand upon the scabbard he there found the sword, which is kept to this day,² on account of the miracle, in the treasury of the kings. Moreover it is, as they say, chased in one part, but can never be inlaid either with gold or silver. Confiding in this divine present, and at the same time, as it began to dawn, attacking the Norwegian, he continued the battle unwearied until the evening, and put him to flight with his whole army. There fell Constantine, king of the Scots, a man of treacherous energy and vigorous old age, five other kings, twelve earls,³ and almost the whole assemblage of barbarians: the few who escaped were preserved to embrace the faith of Christ.

⁴ The submission of the kings to Athelstan took place at Eamot on the 12th of July, A. D. 926.

⁵ There are several chiefs named Anlaf mentioned at this period in the Anglo-Saxon Annals; and it is not always easy to identify the individual who may be mentioned.

§ 132. Concerning this king,⁴ a strong persuasion is prevalent among the English, that one more just or learned never governed the kingdom. That he was versed in literature I discovered a few days since, in a certain old volume, wherein the writer struggles with the difficulty of his task, unable to express his meaning as he wished. Indeed, I would subjoin his words for brevity sake were they not extravagant beyond belief in the praises of the king, and just in that style of writing which Cicero, the prince of Roman eloquence, in his book on Rhetoric, denominates "bombast." The custom of that time excuses the diction, and the affection for Ethelstan, who was yet living, gave countenance to the excess of praise. I shall subjoin therefore, in familiar language,⁵ some few circumstances which may tend to augment his reputation.

§ 133. King Edward, after many noble exploits both in war and peace, a few days before his death subdued the contumacy of the city of Chester,⁶ which was rebelling in confederacy with the Britons; and placing a garrison there, he fell sick and died at

² It appears by the Patent Roll, 9th of John, that the king had among his regalia two swords, viz. "ensis Tristami et alius ensis:" it is not improbable that the sword which was preserved in the king's treasury when Malmesbury wrote, may have been the "alius ensis" referred to in the letters patent above cited.

⁴ That is, Athelstan.

Ferendun, and was buried, as I before related, at Winchester. Ethelstan, as his father had commanded in his will, was then hailed king—recommended by his years, for he was now thirty, and the maturity of his wisdom. For even his grandfather Elfred, seeing and embracing him affectionately, when a boy of astonishing beauty and graceful manners, had most devoutly prayed that his government might be prosperous; indeed, he had made him a knight¹ unusually early, giving him a scarlet cloak, a belt studded with jewels, and a Saxon sword with a golden scabbard. Next he had provided that he should be educated in the court of Ethelfleda his daughter, and of his son-in-law Ethelred; so that, having been brought up in expectation of succeeding to the kingdom by the tender care of his aunt and of this celebrated prince, he repressed and destroyed all envy by the lustre of his good qualities; and after the death of his father and decease of his brother, he was crowned at Kingeston. Hence, to celebrate such splendid events and the joy of that day, the poet justly exclaims,—

“ Of royal race, a noble stem
 Hath chased our darkness, like a gem :
 Great Adelstan, his country’s pride,
 Whose virtue never turns aside,
 Sent by his father to the schools,
 Patient he bore their rigid rules ;
 And drinking deep of science mild,
 Pass’d his first years unlike a child.
 Next, clothed in youth’s bewitching charms,
 Studied the harsher lore of arms,
 Which soon confess’d his knowledge keen,
 As next was in the sovereign seen.
 Soon as his father, good and great,
 Yielded, though ever famed, to fate,
 The youth was call’d the realm to guide,
 And, like his parent, well preside.
 The nobles meet, the crown present ;
 On rebels, prelates curses vent :
 The people light the festive fires,
 And show by turns their kind desires,
 Their deeds, their loyalty declare,
 Though hopes and fears their bosoms share.
 With festive treat the court abounds,
 Foams the bright wine, the hall resounds
 The pages run, the servants haste,
 Song cheers the soul, and food the taste,
 The minstrel sings, the guests commend,
 Whilst all in praise to Christ contend.
 The king with pleasure all things sees,
 And all his kind attentions please.”

§ 134. The solemnity of the consecration being finished, Ethelstan, that he might not deceive the expectation of his subjects and fall below their opinion, subdued the whole of England, except Northumbria, by the single terror of his name. One Sihtric, a relation of that Gurmund² who is mentioned in the history of Elfred, presided over this people, a barbarian both by race and disposition; who, though he ridiculed the power of preceding kings, humbly solicited affinity with Ethelstan, sending messengers expressly for the purpose; and he himself, shortly following, confirmed the proposals of the ambassadors. In consequence, honoured by a union with his sister, and by various presents, he laid the basis of a perpetual treaty. But, as I have before observed,¹ dying at the end of a year, he afforded Ethelstan an opportunity for uniting Northumbria, which belonged to him both by ancient right and recent affinity, to his sovereignty. Analaf the son of Sihtric then fled into Ireland,² and his brother Godefrid into Scotland.³ Messengers from the king immediately followed to Constantine, king of the Scots, and Eugenius, king of the Cumbrians, claiming the fugitive under a denunciation of war. The barbarians had not courage to resist, but without delay coming to a place called Dacor, they surrendered themselves and their kingdoms to the sovereign of England.⁴ Out of regard to this treaty, the king himself stood as sponsor for the son of Constantine, who was ordered to be baptized at the sacred font. Godefrid, however, amid the preparations for the journey, escaped by flight with one Turfrid, a leader of the opposite party; and afterwards laying siege to York, when he could not succeed in bringing the townsmen to surrender either by entreaties or by threats, he departed. Not long after, being both shut up in a castle, they eluded the vigilance of the guards and escaped. Turfrid, losing his life quickly after by shipwreck, became a prey to fishes; Godefrid suffering extremely both by sea and land, at last came a suppliant to court. Being amicably received by the king, and sumptuously entertained for four days, he resought his ships—an incorrigible pirate, and accustomed to live in the water like a fish. In the meantime Ethelstan levelled with the ground the castle which the Danes had formerly fortified in York, that there might be no place for disloyalty to shelter in; and the booty which had been found there, which was very considerable, he generously divided among the whole army man by man; for he had prescribed himself this rule of conduct, never to hoard up riches, but liberally to expend all his acquisitions either on monasteries, or on his faithful followers. On these, during the whole of his life, he expended his paternal treasures, as well as the produce of his victories. To the clergy he was humble and affable; to the laity mild and pleasant; to the nobility, rather reserved, from respect to his dignity; to the lower classes, laying aside the stateliness of power, out of regard to their poverty, he was kindly condescending. He was, as we have heard, of middle height, thin in person, his hair flaxen, as I have

² The flight of Analaf the son of Sihtric into Ireland, here mentioned, has led some to identify him with Olaf of Ireland, who fought against Ethelstan in 938. The Saxon Chronicle states that in 944 king Edmund expelled from Northumberland two kings, Analaf son of Sihtric, and Regenald son of Guthferth.

⁴ Florence of Worcester, under the year 934 (Sax. Chron. 933), relates that Ethelstan, because Constantine, king of the Scots, had broken his treaty with him, marched against Scotland, and Constantine gave his son as a hostage to the English king.

seen by his reliques, and beautifully wreathed with golden threads. Extremely beloved by his subjects from admiration of his fortitude and humility, and terrific to those who rebelled against him, through his invincible courage, he compelled the rulers of the Northern Welsh, that is, of the North Britons, to meet him at the city of Hereford, and after some opposition to surrender to his power: so that he actually brought to pass what no king before him had even presumed to think of, which was, that they should pay annually, by way of tribute, twenty pounds of gold, three hundred of silver, twenty-five thousand¹ oxen, besides as many dogs as he might choose, which from their sagacious scent could discover the retreats and hiding-places of wild beasts, and birds trained to make prey of others in the air. Departing thence he turned towards the Western Britons, who are called the Cornwalish, because, situated in the west of Britain, they are opposite to the extremity of Gaul.² Fiercely attacking, he obliged them to retreat from Exeter, which till that time they had inhabited with equal privileges with the Angles, fixing the boundary of their province on the other side the river Tamar, as he had appointed the river Wye to the North Britons. This city,³ then, which he had cleansed by purging it of its contaminated race, he fortified with towers, and surrounded with a wall of squared stone: and, though the barren and unfruitful soil can scarcely produce indifferent oats, and frequently only the empty husk without the grain, yet, owing to the magnificence of the city, the opulence of its inhabitants, and the constant resort of strangers, every kind of merchandise is there so abundant that nothing is wanting which can conduce to human comfort. Many noble traces of him are to be seen in that city, as well as in the neighbouring district, which will be better described by the conversation of the natives than by my narrative.

§ 135. On this account all Europe resounded with his praises, and extolled his valour to the skies: foreign princes with justice esteemed themselves happy if they could purchase his friendship either by affinity or by presents. Harold, king of Norway,⁴ sent him a ship with a golden beak and a purple sail, furnished within all round with a close-set row of gilded shields. The names of the persons sent with it were Helgrim and Osfrid, who being received with princely magnificence in the city of York, were amply compensated by rich presents for the labour of their journey. Henry the first, (for there were many of the name,) the son of Conrad,⁵ king of the Teutons and emperor of the Romans, demanded his sister, as I have before related, for his son Otho;⁶ passing over so many neighbouring kings, but contemplating from a distance Ethelstan's noble descent and greatness of mind. So completely, indeed, had these two qualities taken up their abode with him, that none could be more noble or illustrious in descent, none more bold or prompt in disposition. Maturely considering that he had four sisters who were all equally beautiful, except only as their ages made a difference, he sent two to the emperor at his request; and how he disposed of them in marriage has already been related. Lewis,¹ prince of Aquitaine, a descendant of Charles the Great, obtained the third in wedlock: the fourth, in whom the whole essence of beauty had centered, which the others only possessed in part, was demanded from her brother by Hugh, king of the Franks.² The chief of this embassy was Adulf, son of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, by Ethelswitha, daughter of king Edward.³ When he had declared the request of the suitor in an assembly of the nobility at Abendon, he produced such liberal presents as might gratify the most boundless avarice: perfumes such as never had been seen in England before: jewels, but more especially emeralds, the greenness of which, reflected by the sun, illumined the countenances of the by-standers with agreeable light: many fleet horses with their trappings, and, as Virgil says, "champing their golden bits:"⁴ an onyx vase so exquisitely chased, that the corn-fields really seemed to wave, the vines to bud, the figures of men actually to move, and so clear and polished, that it reflected the features like a mirror: the sword of Constantine the Great, on which the name of its original possessor was read in golden letters; on theommel, upon thick plates of gold, might be seen fixed an iron nail, one of the four which the Jewish faction used for the crucifixion of our Lord: the spear of Charles the Great, which whenever that invincible emperor hurled in his expeditions against the Saracens, he always came off conqueror;—it was reported to be the same which, driven into the side of our Saviour by the hand of the centurion,⁵ opened by that precious wound the joys of paradise to wretched mortals: the banner of the most blessed martyr Maurice, chief of the Theban legion,⁶ with which the same king, in the Spanish war, used to break through the battalions of the enemy, however fierce and wedged together, and put them to flight; a diadem, precious from its quantity of gold, but more so for its jewels, the splendour of which threw the sparks of light so strongly on the beholders, that the more stedfastly any person endeavoured to gaze, so much the more was he dazzled, and compelled to avert his eyes : part of the holy and adorable cross enclosed in crystal, where the eye, piercing through the substance of the stone, might discern the colour and size of the wood : a small portion of the crown of thorns, enclosed in a similar manner, which, in derision of his government, the madness of the soldiers placed on Christ's sacred head. The noble king, delighted with such great and exquisite presents, made an equal return of good offices, and gratified the soul of the longing suitor by an union with his sister. Some of these presents he left to the kings who succeeded him ; but to Malmesbury he gave part of the cross and crown, by the support of which, I believe, that place even now flourishes, though it has suffered so many shipwrecks of its liberty, so many attacks of its enemies.¹ In this place he ordered Elwin and Ethelwin, the sons of his uncle Ethelwerd, whom he had lost in the battle against Analaf,² to be honourably buried, expressing his design of resting here himself ; of which battle it is now proper time to give the account of that poet, from whom I have taken all these transactions.

“ His subjects governing with justest sway,
 Tyrants o'erawed, twelve years had pass'd away,
 When Europe's noxious pestilence stalk'd forth,
 And pour'd the barbarous legions from the North.
 Then pirate Analaf the briny surge Forsakes, while deeds of desperation urge.
 Her king consenting, Scotia's land receives
 The frantic madman and his horde of thieves :
 Now flush'd with insolence, they shout and boast,
 And drive the harmless natives from the coast.
 Thus while the king, secure in youthful pride,
 Bade the soft hours in gentle pleasure glide,
 Though erst he stemm'd the battle's furious tide,
 With ceaseless plunder sped the daring horde,
 And wasted districts with their fire and sword.
 The verdant crops lay withering on the fields,
 The glebe no promise to the rustic yields.
 Immense the numbers of barbarian force,
 Countless the squadrons both of foot and horse.
 At length fame's rueful moan alarm'd the king,
 And bade him shun this ignominious sting,
 That arms like his to ruffian bands should bend :
 'Tis done—delays and hesitations end.
 High in the air the threatening banners fly,
 And call his eager troops to victory,
 His hardy force, an hundred thousand strong,
 Whom standards hasten to the fight along.
 The martial clamour scares the plund'ring band,
 And drives them bootless tow'rd's their native land.
 The vulgar mass a dreadful carnage share,
 And shed contagion on the ambient air ;
 While Analaf alone, of all the crew,
 Escapes the meed of death so justly due,
 Reserved by fortune's favour, once again
 When Ethelstan was dead, to claim our strain.’

§ 136. This place seems to require that I should relate the death of Elfred in the words of the king, for which I before pledged the faith of my narrative ;¹ for as he had commanded the bodies of his relations to be conveyed to Malmesbury, and interred at the head of the sepulchre of St. Aldelm, so he honoured the place afterwards to such a degree as to esteem none more holy. Bestowing many large estates upon it, he confirmed them by charters, in one of which, after the donation, he adds the words which follow :—

Of the Death of Elfred, the rival of Ethelstan.

§ 137. “² Be it known to the sages of our kingdom, that I have not unjustly seized the lands aforesaid, or dedicated plunder to God ; but that I have received them, as the English nobility, and even John,³ the pope of the church of Rome himself, have judged fitting, on the death of Elfred. He, the jealous rival both of my happiness and life, consenting to the wickedness of my enemies, who on my father's decease, had not God in his mercy delivered me, wished to put out my eyes in the city of Winchester ; but, on the discovery of their infernal contrivances, he was sent to the church of Rome to defend himself by oath before pope John. This he did at the altar of St. Peter ; but at the very instant he had sworn, he fell down before it, and was carried by his servants to the English school,⁴ where he died the third night after. The pope immediately sent to consult with us as to the disposal of his body, and whether it should be placed among other Christians. On receiving this account, the nobility of our kingdom, with the whole body of his relations, humbly entreated that we would grant our permission that his remains might be buried with those of other Christians. Consenting, therefore, to their urgent request, we sent back our compliance to Rome, and with the pope's permission he was buried, though unworthy, along with other Christians. And so all his property of every description was adjudged to be mine. Moreover, we have recorded this in writing, that, so long as Christianity reigns, it may never be forgotten whence the aforesaid land, which I have given to God and St. Peter, was granted to me ; nor do I know anything more just than that I should bestow this gift on God and St. Peter, who caused my rival to fall in the sight of all persons, and conferred on me a prosperous reign.”

§ 138. In these words of the king, we may equally venerate his wisdom and his piety in sacred matters : his wisdom, that so young a man should perceive that a sacrifice obtained by rapine could not be acceptable to God ; his piety, in so gratefully making a return to God, out of a benefit conferred on him by divine vengeance. Moreover, it may be necessary to observe, that at that time the church of St. Peter was the chief of the monastery, which now is deemed second only; the church of St. Mary, which the monks at present frequent, was built afterwards in the time of king Edgar, under abbot Elfric.¹ Thus far relating to the king I have written from authentic testimony: that which follows I have learned more from old ballads,² popular through succeeding times, than from books written expressly for the information of posterity. I have subjoined them, not to defend their veracity, but to put my reader in possession of all I know. First, then, to the relation of his birth.

§ 139. There was in a certain village a shepherd's daughter, a girl of exquisite beauty, who gained through the elegance of her person what her birth could never have bestowed. In a vision she beheld a prodigy: the moon shone from her womb, and all England was illuminated by the light. When she sportively related this

“How great was his reputation among the French, not only for his courage in war, but also for his Christian piety, is satisfactorily proved by the following epistle:—

“I Rohbod, the provost of Samson the high-priest, wish to the celebrated and munificent king Ethelstan, the glory of this world and the blessedness of eternity, to the honour of the great and undivided Trinity, and by the most effectual intercession of all saints.

“Let it be known to your goodness and majesty, O king Adelstan, most excellent among all the sovereigns of this present time, that while our realm still preserved its stability, your father Edmund recommended himself by his letters for admission into the guild of the fraternity of St. Samson, the great confessor, and of Levenanus the elder, the archbishop and my relative, and of his clerks. Wherefore, even to the present day we offer up unceasing prayers to Christ the King for the health of his soul and of yours; and we promise—I and my twelve clerks—as if we were kneeling before you on our knees, that day and night we will pray to the mercy of God for you in our psalms, and masses, and prayers; observing, as we do, how your kindness is manifested towards us. And now I send you some relics, which we are persuaded are dearer to you than all earthly glory; that is, the bones of St. Senator, and St. Paternus, and St. Scubilion the master of the said Paternus, who departed to Christ upon one and the same day and hour as Paternus did. Assuredly these two saints are laid on the right and left of St. Paternus in his tomb; and their festivals are celebrated upon the ninth of the kalends of October [23d Sept.] along with that of St. Paternus. Wherefore, O glorious king, we pray and humbly entreat you, who art the exalter of the holy church, the humbler of wicked heathendom, the mirror for your own nation, the example of everything that is good, the disperser of the enemies, the father of clerks, the assister of the poor, the lover of all the saints, the invoker of angels—we who deservedly dwell in France in banishment and captivity for our sins—entreat you that, in the greatness of your bounty, you would not forget us.” So far the epistle. The king sent the relics of St. Paternus to Malmesbury, and those of the other saints to Mideltune, where he had erected a monastery from its foundations. For at that time, as I have before said, while the Norman pirates were infesting the whole sea-coast, as well as the towns which were situated upon the Loire, the bodies of the saints of Lesser Britanny, and of that part of Gaul which is now called Normandy, were translated and removed to safer places, and so were easily sold to any one who wished to purchase them from the poverty of their bearers, and more especially to Ethelstan, a king in good reputation, and one who eagerly coveted such commodities.”

Paternus, bishop of Avranches, died at Vannes about A. D. 555. A copy of his life is in the Coll. MS. Vesp. A. xiv., and an abstract is contained in Capgrave.

to her companions in the morning, it was not so lightly received, but it immediately reached the ears of the woman who used to nurse the sons of the king. Deliberating on this matter, she took her home and adopted her as a daughter, bringing up this young maiden with costlier attire, more delicate food, and more elegant demeanour. Soon after, Edward the son of king Elfred, travelling through the village, stopped at the house which had been the scene of his infantile education: indeed, he thought it would be a blemish on his reputation to omit paying his salutations to his nurse. Becoming deeply enamoured of the young woman from the instant he saw her, he passed the night with her. Pregnant from this single intercourse, she realized her dream when she brought forth her son Ethelstan; for at the expiration of his childish years, as he approached manhood, he proved by many noble actions what just expectations of royal aptitude might be entertained of him. King Edward therefore dying, was shortly followed by his legitimate son Elward. All hopes now centered in Ethelstan; Elfred alone,¹ a man of uncommon insolence, who disdained to be governed by a sovereign whom he had not voluntarily chosen, secretly opposing with his party to the utmost. But he being detected and punished, as the king has before related, there were some who even accused Edwin the king's brother of treachery. Base and dreadful crime! to embroil fraternal affection by sinister constructions. Edwin, though imploring both personally and by messengers the confidence of his brother, and though invalidating the accusation by an oath, was nevertheless driven into exile. So far, indeed, did the dark suggestions of some persons prevail on a mind distracted with various cares, that, forgetful of a brother's love, he expelled the youth, an object of pity even to strangers, and that, too, in a mode cruel in the extreme; for he was compelled to go on board a vessel with a single attendant, without a rower, without even an oar, and the bark was crazy with age. Fortune laboured for a long time to restore the innocent youth to land; but when at length, far out at sea, the sails could not endure the violence of the wind, the young man, delicate and weary of life under such circumstances, put an end to his existence by a voluntary plunge into the water.² The attendant, wisely determining to prolong his life, sometimes by shunning the hostile waves, and sometimes by urging the boat forward with his feet, brought his master's body to land, in the narrow sea which flows between Whitsand and Dover. Ethelstan, when his anger cooled and his mind became calm, shuddered at the deed; and submitting to a seven years' penance, he inflicted severe vengeance on the accuser of his brother. He was the king's cup-bearer, and on this account had opportunity of enforcing his insinuations. It so happened, on a festive day as he was serving wine, that slipping with one foot in the midst of the chamber, he recovered himself with the other. On this occasion he made use of an expression which proved his destruction: "Thus brother," said he, "assists brother." The king, on hearing this, ordered the faithless wretch to be put to death, loudly reproaching him with the loss of that assistance he might have had from his brother, were he alive, and bewailing his death.

§ 140. These circumstances of Edwin's death, though extremely probable, I the less venture to affirm for truth, on account of the extraordinary affection he manifested towards the rest of his brothers: for, as his father had left them very young, he cherished them whilst children with much kindness, and when grown up made them partakers of his kingdom. It is before related to what dignity he exalted such of his sisters as his father had left unmarried and unprovided for. Completing his earthly course, and that a short one, Ethelstan died at Gloucester.¹ His noble remains were conveyed to Malmesbury, and buried under the altar. Many gifts both in gold and silver, as well as reliques of saints, purchased abroad in Brittany, were carried before the body; for in such things, admonished as they say in a dream, he expended the treasures of his father, which he himself had for a long time kept whole and untouched. His years, though few, were full of glory.

Of King Edmund the First.

§ 141. In the year of our Lord's incarnation nine hundred and forty,² Edmund the brother of Ethelstan, a youth of about eighteen, received and held the government for six years and a half. In his time the Northumbrians, meditating a renewal of hostilities, violated the treaty which they had made with Ethelstan, and created Analaf, whom they had recalled from Ireland, their king. Edmund, who thought it disgraceful not to complete his brother's victorious course, led his troops against the delinquents; who presently retreating, he subjugated all the cities on this side the river Humber.³ Analaf, with a certain prince, Reinald,⁴ the son of that Gurmund, of whom we have spoken in the history of Alfred, after having ascertained the disposition of the king, offered to surrender himself, proffering his conversion to Christianity⁵ as a pledge of his fidelity. His savage nature, however, did not permit him to remain long in this resolution, for he violated his oath, and irritated his lord; in consequence of which, the following year⁶ he suffered for his crimes, being doomed to perpetual exile. The province which ¹ He died on Wednesday, 27th of Oct. 941.

² The year upon which Edmund succeeded to the throne has been questioned; but the authority of the Saxon Chronicle, and of many charters (Cod. Dipl. Nos. 379, 384—387), satisfy us in deciding that he ascended the throne immediately upon the death of his brother, in the end of A. D. 940.

is called Cumberland, Edmund assigned to Malcolm king of the Scots, under fealty of an oath.¹

§ 142. ²Among the many donations which the king conferred on different churches, he exalted that of Glastonbury, through his singular affection towards it, with great estates and honours; and granted it a charter, in these words:³—

§ 143. “ In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, I Edmund, king of the Angles, and governor and ruler of the other surrounding nations, with the advice and consent of my nobility, for the hope of eternal reward and remission of my transgressions, do grant to the church of the mother of God, Mary of Glastonbury, and the venerable Dunstan, whom I have there constituted abbot,⁴ the franchise and jurisdiction, rights, customs, and all the forfeitures of all their possessions; that is to say, burgherihtha and hundred-setena, athas and ordelas, and infangenetheofas, hamsocne, and frithbrice, and forestal and tol, and team, throughout my kingdom; and their lands shall be free to them, and released from all exactions, as my own are. But more especially shall the town of Glastonbury, in which is situated that most ancient church of the holy mother of God, together with its bounds, be more free than other places. The abbot of this place alone shall have power, as well in causes known as unknown, in small and in great, and even in those which are above and under the earth, on dry land and in the water, in woods and in plains, and he shall have the same authority of punishing or remitting the crimes of delinquents perpetrated within it as my court has, in the same manner as my predecessors have granted and confirmed by charter; to wit, Edward my father, and Elfred his father, and Chentwine, Ine, and Chuthred, and many others, who more peculiarly honoured and esteemed that noble place. And that any one, either bishop, or duke, or prince, or any of their servants, should dare to enter it for the purpose of holding courts, or distraining, or doing anything contrary to the will of the servants of God there, I inhibit under God's curse. Whosoever, therefore, shall benevolently augment my donation, may his life be prosperous in this present world and long may he enjoy his happiness; but whosoever shall presume to invade it through his own rashness, let him know for certain, that he shall be compelled, with fear and trembling, to give account before the tribunal of the rigorous Judge, unless he shall first atone for his offence by proper satisfaction.”

The aforesaid donation was granted in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ's incarnation nine hundred and forty-four, in the second of the indiction, and was written in letters of gold, in the book of the Gospels which he presented to the same church, elegantly adorned.

⁴ St. Dunstan was appointed abbot of Glastonbury A. D. 942 (Flor. Wigorn.); A. D. 943 (Sax. Chron.) Compare Bridferth, De Vita S. Dunstani, Act. SS. 19 Maii.

§ 144. Such great and prosperous successes, however, were obscured by a melancholy death; for a certain robber named Leof, whom he had banished for his robberies, returning after six years' absence, totally unexpected, was sitting, on the feast of St. Augustine, archbishop of Canterbury [26th May], among the royal guests at Pukelechirche;¹ for on this day the English were wont to regale in commemoration of their preacher; by chance, too, he was placed near a nobleman whom the king had condescended to make his guest. This, while the others were eagerly carousing, was perceived by the king alone; when, hurried with indignation and impelled by fate, he leaped from the table, caught the robber by the hair, and dragged him to the floor; but the other secretly drawing a dagger from its sheath, plunged it with all his force into the breast of the king as he lay upon him. Dying of the wound,² he gave rise, over the whole kingdom, to many fictions concerning his decease. The robber was shortly torn limb from limb by the attendants who rushed in, though he wounded some of them ere they could accomplish their purpose. St. Dunstan, at that time abbot of Glastonbury, had foreseen his ignoble end, being fully persuaded of it from the gesticulations and insolent mockery of a devil dancing before him; wherefore, hastening to court at full speed, he received intelligence of the transaction on the road. By common consent, then, it was determined that his body should be brought to Glastonbury, and there magnificently buried, in the northern part of the tower. That such had been his intention, through his singular regard for the abbot, was evident from particular circumstances: the village where he was murdered was made an offering for the dead, that the spot which had witnessed his fall might ever after minister aid to his soul.

§ 145. In his fourth year, that is, in the year of our Lord nine hundred and forty-four,³ William the son of Rollo, duke of Normandy, was treacherously killed in France, which old writers relate as having been done with some degree of justice. Riulf, one of the Norman nobility, owing William a grudge from some unknown cause, harassed him with perpetual aggressions. His son Anschetil, who served under the earl, to gratify his lord, ventured to offer violence to nature; for taking his father in battle, he delivered him into the power of the earl, relying on the most solemn oath, that he should suffer nothing beyond imprisonment. As wickedness, however, constantly discovers pretences for crime, the earl shortly after, feigning an excuse, sends Anschetil to Pavia, bearing a letter to the duke of Italy, the purport of which was his own destruction. Completing his journey, he was received on his entrance into the city in the most respectful manner. On delivering the letter, the duke, astonished at the treachery, shuddered that a warrior of such singular address should be ordered to be slain ; but as he would not oppose the request of so renowned a nobleman, he laid an ambush of a thousand horsemen, as it is said, for Anschetil when he left the city. For a long time, with his companions whom he had selected out of all Normandy, he resisted their attack ; but at last he fell nobly, compensating his own death by slaying many of the enemy. The only survivor on either side was Balzo, a Norman, a man of small size, but of incredible courage ; although some say that he was ironically called Short : this man, I say, alone hovered round the city, and by his single sword terrified the townspeople as long as he thought proper. No person will deem this incredible, who considers what efforts the desperation of one courageous man will produce, and how little military valour the people of that region possess. Returning thence to his own country, he laid his complaint of the perfidy of his lord before the king of France : for fame reported too that Riulf, while in chains, had had his eyes put out. In consequence the earl, being cited to his trial at Paris, was met, under the pretence of a conference, as they assert, and killed by Balzo in the middle of the river Seine ;¹ thus making atonement for his own perfidy, and satisfying the rage of his antagonist. His death was the source of long discord between the French and Normans, till by the exertion of Richard his son it had a termination worthy of such a personage. Truer histories indeed relate, that, being at enmity with Ernulf earl of Flanders, he had possessed himself of one of his castles, and that being invited out by him to a conference, on a pretended design of making a truce, he was killed by Balzo, as they were conversing in a ship ; that a key was found at his girdle, which, being applied to the lock of his private cabinet, discovered certain monastic habiliments ; for he ever designed, even amid his warlike pursuits, that he would one day become a monk at Jumièges, which place, deserted from the time of Hasteng, he cleared of the overspreading thorns, and with princely magnificence exalted to its present state.

Concerning King Edred.

§ 146. In the year of our Lord nine hundred and forty-six,² Edred, Edward's third son, assuming the government, reigned nine years and a half. He gave proof that he had not degenerated in greatness of soul from his father and his brothers ; for he nearly exterminated the Northumbrians and the Scots, laying waste the whole province with sword and famine ; because, having with little difficulty compelled them to swear fidelity to him, they broke their oath, and made Eric their king.¹ He for a long time kept Wulstan, archbishop of York, who it was said connived at the revolt of his countrymen, in chains; but afterwards, out of respect to his ecclesiastical dignity, he released and pardoned him. In the meantime the king himself, prostrate at the feet of the saints, devoted his life to God and to Dunstan, by whose admonition he endured with patience his frequent bodily pains,² prolonged his prayers, and made his palace altogether the school of virtue. He died,³ accompanied with the utmost grief of men, but joy of angels; for Dunstan, learning by a messenger that he was sick, while urging his horse in order to see him, heard a voice thundering over his head, "Now, king Edred sleeps in the Lord." He lies buried in the cathedral at Winchester.

§ 147. In the year of our Lord nine hundred and fifty-five,⁴ Edwy the son of Edmund⁵ the former king, taking possession of the kingdom, retained it four years—a wanton youth, who abused the beauty of his person in illicit intercourse. Finally, taking a woman nearly related to him as his wife, and doting on her beauty, he despised the advice of his counsellors. On the very day on which he had been consecrated king, in full assembly of the nobility, when deliberating on affairs of importance and essential to the state, he burst suddenly from amongst them, darted wantonly into his chamber, and rioted in the embraces of the harlot.⁶ All were indignant at the shameless deed, and murmured among themselves. Dunstan alone, with that firmness which his name implies,⁷ regardless of the royal indignation, violently dragged the lascivious boy from the chamber; and through the instrumentality of Odo the archbishop,

² Some interesting details respecting the sickness and death of Edred are found in the Life of St. Dunstan, § 20, ap. Act. SS. Maii, iv. 353.

⁶ This story is related in all the lives of St. Dunstan. Bridferth alone mentions the name of Elfyfu; Eadmer and a MS. Life of St. Dunstan (Cott. MS. Nero, E. i.) state that she was "ex magna et alta progenie nata, filiam adultam secum habens;" but all agree that there were two women, mother and daughter. Malmesbury, in his Life of St. Dunstan, repeats the same account.

⁷ A similar expression occurs in Osberne, in his Life of St. Dunstan. In Anglo-Saxon, "dun" signifies a hill, and "stan" a stone.

compelling him to repudiate the strumpet,¹ he made him his enemy for ever. Soon after, upheld by the most contemptible supporters, he afflicted with undeserved calamities all the members of the monastic order throughout England, who were first despoiled of their property, and then driven into exile. He drove Dunstan himself, the chief of monks, into Flanders.² At that time the appearance of the monasteries was sad and pitiable. Even³ the monastery of Malmesbury, which had been inhabited by monks for more than two hundred and seventy years, he made a stye for secular canons. But thou, O Lord Jesu, our Creator and Redeemer, gracious Disposer, and abundantly able to remedy our defects by means of those irregular and vagabond men; Thou didst bring to light thy treasure, hidden for so many years—I mean the body of St. Aldelm, which they took up and placed in a shrine. The royal generosity increased the fame of the canons, for the king bestowed on the saint an estate,⁴ very convenient both from its size and vicinity. But my recollection shudders even at this time to think how cruel he was to other monasteries, equally on account of the giddiness of youth and the pernicious counsel of his concubine, who was perpetually poisoning his unformed mind. But let his soul, long since placed in rest by the interposition of Dunstan,⁵ pardon my grief; grief, I say, compels me to condemn him, because private advantage is not to be preferred to public loss, but rather public loss should outweigh private advantage. He paid the penalty of his rash attempt even in this life, being despoiled of the greatest part of his kingdom,⁶ shocked with which calamity he died,⁷ and was buried in the New Minster at Winchester.

Of King Edgar.

§ 148. In the year of our Lord's incarnation nine hundred and fifty-nine, Edgar, the honour and delight of the English, the son of Edmund, the brother of Edwi, a youth of sixteen years old, assuming the government, held it for about a similar period. The transactions of his reign are celebrated with peculiar splendour even in our times. The divine love, which he sedulously procured by his devotion and energy of counsel, shone propitious on his years. It is commonly reported, that at his birth⁸ Dunstan heard an angelic voice saying, "Peace to England so long as this child shall

³ The paragraph from "Even" down to "vicinity" occurs almost word for word in Malmes. De Vita Aldhelmi. (Angl. Sacr. ii. 32.)

⁴ The charter to which Malmesbury alludes, dated A. D. 956, may be seen in the Cod. Dipl. No. 460 (ii. 336.) It is a forgery.

reign, and our Dunstan shall live." The succession of events was in unison with the heavenly oracle—so much, while he lived, did ecclesiastical glory flourish, and martial clamour decay: scarcely does a year elapse in the Chronicles, in which he did not perform something great and advantageous to his country, in which he did not build some new monastery. He experienced no internal treachery, no foreign attack. Kinad king of the Scots, Malcolm of the Cumbrians, that prince of pirates Mascus, all the Welsh kings,¹ whose names were Dufnal, Giferth, Huual, Jacob, Judethil, being summoned to his court, were bound to him by one, and that a lasting oath; so that, meeting him at Chester, he exhibited them on the river Dee in triumph:² for putting them all on board the same vessel, he compelled them to row him as he sat at the prow, thus displaying his regal magnificence, who held so many kings in subjection. Indeed, he is reported to have said that henceforward his successors might truly boast of being kings of England, since they would enjoy so singular an honour. Hence his fame being noised abroad, foreigners, Saxons, Flemings, and even Danes themselves, frequently sailed hither, and were on terms of intimacy with Edgar, though their arrival was highly prejudicial to the natives; for from the Saxons they learnt an untameable ferocity of mind, from the Flemings an unmanly delicacy of body, and from the Danes drunkenness, though they were before free from such propensities, and disposed to observe their own customs with native simplicity rather than admire those of others. For this, history justly and deservedly blames him; for the other imputations, which I shall mention hereafter, rest upon no higher authority than ballads.

§ 149. At this time the light of holy men was so resplendent in England, that you would believe the very stars from heaven smiled upon it. Among these was Dunstan,³ whom I have mentioned so frequently, first abbot of Glastonbury, next bishop of Worcester, and lastly archbishop of Canterbury; of great power in earthly matters, in high favour with God—in the one representing Martha, in the other Mary. Next to king Elfred, he was the most extraordinary patron of the liberal arts throughout the whole island; the magnificent restorer of monasteries. Terrible were his denunciations against transgressing kings and princes;⁴ kind was his support of the middling and poorer classes. Indeed, so extremely anxious was he to preserve peace even in trivial matters, that, as his countrymen used to assemble in taverns, and when a little elevated with drink, quarrel as to the sharing of their liquor, he ordered gold

³ The life of St. Dunstan appears to have been a favourite theme with the monkish writers. See a list of his biographers in Lappenberg (ii. 129). Dunstan was born A. D. 925, made abbot of Glastonbury in 942, bishop of Worcester in 957, and in the next year he was translated to London; he was appointed to the see of Canterbury in 959, and in the following year went to Rome to receive the pall from pope John XII. He died A. D. 988.

⁴ The severity with which he visited the profligate conduct of the kings Edgar and Edwy is here alluded to.

or silver pegs¹ to be fastened in the pots, that, whilst every man knew his just measure, shame should compel each neither to take more himself, nor oblige others to drink beyond their own proper share. Osberne,² precentor of Canterbury, second to none of these times in composition, and indisputably the best skilled of all in music, who wrote his life with Roman eloquence, forbids me (though I wish so to do) to relate further praiseworthy anecdotes of him. Besides, in addition to this, if the divine grace shall accompany my design, I intend,³ after the succession of the kings, at least to particularise the names of all the bishops of each province in England, and to offer them to the knowledge of my countrymen, if I shall be able to coin anything worth notice out of the mintage of antiquity. How powerful indeed was his example, is shown by the sanctity and virtue of Dunstan's disciples. Adelwold,⁴ who was made abbot of Abingdon, from having been a monk of Glastonbury, and afterwards bishop of Winchester, built so many and such great monasteries, as to make it appear hardly credible how the bishop of one city should be able to effect what the king of England himself could scarcely undertake. I am deceived, and err through hasty opinion, if what I assert be not evident. How great are the monasteries of Ely, Peterborough, and Thorney, which he raised from the foundations, and completed by his industry, which, though repeatedly reduced by the wickedness of plunderers, are yet sufficient for their inhabitants. His life was composed in a decent style by Wulstan,⁵ precentor of Winchester, who had been his attendant and pupil. He wrote also another very useful work⁶ "On the Harmony of Sounds," a proof that he was a learned Englishman, a man of pious life and correct eloquence. At that time, too, Oswald⁷ nephew of Odo,⁸ who had been archbishop before Dunstan, from a monk of Fleury, becoming bishop of Worcester and archbishop of York, claimed equal honours with the others;

² Osberne's Life of St. Dunstan is printed in the Angl. Sacr. ii. 88, from a MS. in Lambeth Library; another copy is in the British Museum (Cott. Tiber. D. iii. fol. 119), in which nearly the whole of the second book is wanting. See also Acta SS. Maii, iv. 359.

⁶ Nothing further concerning this work is known to us. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Anglo-Saxon Period, p. 471.

for, treading the same paths,¹ he extended the monastic profession by his authority, and built a monastery at Ramsey, in a marshy situation.² He filled the cathedral of Worcester with regular monks; the canons not being driven out by force, but circumvented by pious fraud.³ Bishop Adelwold, by the royal command, had before expelled the canons from Winchester,⁴ who, upon being given the option⁵ either to live according to rule or depart the place, gave the preference to an easy life, and were at that time without fixed habitations, wandering over the whole island. In this manner these three persons, illuminating England as it were with a triple light, chased away the thick darkness of error. In consequence, Edgar advanced the monastery of Glastonbury, which he ever loved beyond all others, with great possessions, and was anxiously vigilant in all things pertaining either to the beauty or convenience of the church, whether internally or externally. It may be proper here to subjoin to our narrative the charter he granted to the said church, as I have read it in their ancient chartulary.

§ 150. “⁶ In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: Although

² Ramsey abbey was built by Ailwin, the alderman duke of the East Angles, at the instigation of Oswald. See the Ramsey Chronicle in Dugd. Monast. i. 231.

⁶ See this charter of king Eadgar in Malmesb. De Antiquitate Glaston. Ecclesie, (Gale, iii. 320;) and in the Cod. Dipl. No. 567. The date as it there occurs is A. D. 971, indict. xiv. Some MSS., instead of sections 150, 151, read, “Edgar of glorious memory, king of the Angles, son of king Edmund, whose inclinations were ever vigilantly bent on divine matters, often coming to the monastery of the holy mother of God at Glastonbury, and studying to honour this place with dignity superior to others, hath by the common consent of the bishops, abbots, and nobility, conferred on it many and very splendid privileges. The first of which is, that no person, unless a monk of that place, shall there be abbot, either in name or in office, nor any other, except such as the common consent of the meeting shall have chosen, according to the tenor of the rule. But should necessity so require that an abbot or monk of another monastery be made president of this place, then he deems it proper that none shall be appointed but such as the congregation of the monastery may elect to preside over them in the fear of the Lord; nor shall this be done if any, even the lowest of the congregation, can be there found fit for the office. He hath appointed, too, that the election of their abbot shall rest for ever in the monks, reserving only to himself and his heirs the power of giving the pastoral staff to the elected brother. He hath ordained also, that so often as the abbot or the monk of this place shall appoint any of their society to be dignified with holy orders, they shall cause any bishop canonically ordained, either in his own cathedral, or in the monastery of St. Mary at Glastonbury, to ordain such monks and clerks as they deem fit, upon the title of St. Mary. He hath granted, moreover, that as he himself decides in his own dominions, so the abbot or the convent shall decide the causes of their entire island in all matters ecclesiastical or secular, without the contradiction of any one. Nor shall it be lawful for any person to enter that island, which bore witness to his birth, whether he be bishop, duke, or prince, or person of whatever order, for the purpose of there doing anything prejudicial to the servants of God: this he forbids altogether, in the same manner as his predecessors have sanctioned and confirmed by their privileges; that is to say, Cenwine, Ina,

Athellard, Cuthred, Elfred, Edward, Ethelstan, and Aedmund. When, therefore, by the common consent, as has been said, of his prelates, abbots, and nobility, he determined to grant these privileges to the place aforesaid, he laid his own horn, beautifully formed of ivory and adorned with gold, upon the altar of the holy mother of God, and by that donation confirmed them to the same holy mother of God and her monks to be possessed for ever. Soon after he caused this horn to be cut in two in his presence, that no future abbot might give or sell it to any one, commanding part of it to be kept upon the spot for a perpetual testimony of the aforesaid donation. Recollecting, however, how great is the temerity of human inconstancy, and on whom it is likely to creep, and fearing lest any one hereafter should attempt to take away these privileges from this place, or to eject the monks, he sent this charter of his royal liberality to the renowned lord, pope John, who had succeeded Octavian in the honour of the pontificate, begging him to corroborate these grants by an apostolical bull. Kindly receiving the legation, the pope, with the assenting voice of the Roman council, confirmed what had been already ordained, by writing an apostolical injunction, terribly hurling on the violators of them, should any be so daring, the vengeance of a perpetual curse. This confirmation therefore of the aforesaid pope, directed to the same place, king Edgar, of worthy memory, laid upon the altar of the holy mother of God for a perpetual remembrance, commanding it to be carefully kept in future for the information of posterity." We have judged it proper to insert both these instruments, lest we should be supposed to invent such things against those persons who seek to enter into the fold of St. Mary, not like shepherds, by the door, but like thieves and robbers, by some other way.

"Be it known to all the faithful, that I John, through the mercy of God the unworthy pope of the holy Roman see, an entreated by the humble request of the noble Edgar, king of the Angles, and of Dunstan, archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, for the monastery of St. Mary of Glastonbury, which, induced by the love of the heavenly King, they have endowed with many and great possessions, increasing in it the monastic order, and having confirmed it by royal grant, they pray me also so to do. Wherefore, assenting to their affectionate request, I take that place into the bosom of the Roman church and the protection of the holy apostles, and support and confirm its immunities as long as it shall remain in the same conventual order in which it now flourishes. The monks shall have power to elect their own superior; ordination, as well of monks as of clerks, shall be at the will of the abbot and convent; we ordain, moreover, that no person shall have liberty to enter this island, either to hold courts, to make inquiry, or to correct. And should any one attempt to oppose this, or to take away, retain, diminish, or harass with vexatious boldness, the possessions of the same church, he shall become liable to a perpetual curse, by the authority of God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the holy mother of God, the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and all saints, unless he recant. But the peace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all who maintain the rights of the place aforesaid. Amen. And let this our deed remain unshaken. Done in the time of Aelfward, abbot of the said monastery."

The aforesaid king Edgar confirmed these things at London, by his solemn charter, in the twelfth year of his reign; and in the same year, that is, of our Lord 965, the pope aforesaid authorized them in a general synod at Rome, and commanded all members of superior dignity, who were present at the said general council, to confirm them likewise. Let the despisers, then, of so terrible a curse, consider well how severe a sentence of excommunication hangs over their heads; and, indeed, to St. Peter the apostle, the chief of apostles, Christ gave the office both of binding or loosing, as well as the keys of the kingdom of heaven. But to all it must be plain and evident, that the head of the Roman church must be the vicar of this apostle, and the immediate inheritor of his power. Over this church then, John of holy memory laudably presided in his lifetime, as he lives to this day in glorious recollection, promoted thereto by the choice of God and of all the people. If, then, the ordinance of St. Peter the apostle be binding, consequently that of John the pope must be so likewise; but not even a madman would deny the ordinance of Peter the apostle to be binding; consequently, no one in his sober senses can say that the ordinance of John the pope is invalid. Either, therefore, acknowledging the power conferred by Christ on St. Peter and his successors, they will abstain from transgressing against the authority of so dreadful an interdict; or else contemning it, they will, with the devil and his angels, bring upon themselves the eternal duration of the curse aforewritten.

theless, in the storms and tempests of secular matters, the institutions of the holy church of God are often convulsed and broken by the corruption of reprobate men. Wherefore we perceive that it will be advantageous to posterity to confirm by writing what has been determined by wholesome counsel and common consent. In consequence, it seems proper that the church of the most blessed mother of God, the ever virgin Mary of Glastonbury, inasmuch as it has always possessed the chief dignity in my kingdom, should by us be honoured with some very special and unusual privilege. Dunstan, therefore, and Oswald, archbishops of Canterbury and York, exhorting thereto, and Brihtelm,¹ bishop of Wells, and other bishops, abbots, and chiefs assenting and approving, I Edgar, by the grace of God king of the English, and ruler and governor of the adjacent nations, in the name of the blessed Trinity, for the soul of my father who reposes there, and of my predecessors, do by this present privilege decree, appoint, and establish, that the aforesaid monastery and all its possessions shall remain free and exonerated from all payments to the exchequer now and for ever; they² shall have soc and sac, on strand, on stream, on wood, on felde, on grithbrice, on burhbrice, hundred-setena, morthas, athas, and ordeles, calle hordas bufan eorthan, and beneothan, infangenetheof, utfangenetheof, flemeneferthe, hamsoclene, frithbriche, forsteal, tol and team, just as free and peaceably as I have in my kingdom. And let the same liberty and power also as I have in my own court, as well in forgiving as in punishing, and in every other matter, be possessed by the abbot and monks of the aforesaid monastery within their court. And should the abbot or any monk of that place, upon his journey, meet a thief going to the gallows, or to any other punishment of death, they shall have power of rescuing him from impending danger throughout my kingdom. Moreover I confirm and establish, what has hitherto been scrupulously observed by all my predecessors, that the bishop of Wells and his ministers shall have no power whatever over this monastery, or its parish churches, that is to say, Stret, Mirelinch, Budecalege, Sceapwic, Sow, or their chapels; or even over those contained in the islands, that is to say, Beocherie, otherwise called

In consequence, it is manifest that no stranger ever seized this monastery for himself, who did not, as shall appear, disgracefully lose it again; and that this occurred not by any concerted plan of the monks, but by the judgment of God for the avenging of his holy authority. Wherefore let no man reading this despise it, nor make himself conspicuous by being angry at it; for, should he do so, perhaps he will confess that to be said of himself which was designed to be spoken of another.

² Such of these terms as are not explained in the note, § 143, are understood to imply as follows:—Sac and soc, a right to decide disputes within the franchise, and to levy amerancements, to compel the attendance of the tenants whether the cause arise on wood, on strand, or on field; to take cognizance of breach of sureties, murders, all hoards, whether above the earth or under the earth (this seems to imply treasure trove), thieves apprehended without the jurisdiction, and effects of fugitives.

Little Ireland, Godenie, Mertinesie, Patheneberge, Edredeseie, and Ferremere, except only when summoned by the abbot for dedications or ordinations; nor shall they cite their priests to their synods or chapters, or to any of their courts, nor shall they suspend them from their holy office, or presume to exercise any right over them whatever. The abbot shall cause any bishop of the same province he pleases, to ordain his monks and the clerks of the aforesaid churches, according to the ancient custom of the church of Glastonbury, and the apostolical authority of archbishop Dunstan, and the consent of all the bishops of my kingdom; but the dedications of the churches we consign to the bishop of Wells, if he be required by the abbots. At Easter, let him receive the chrism of sanctification, and the oil from the bishop of Wells, according to custom, and distribute them to his before-mentioned churches. This, too, I command above all other things: On the curse of God and by my authority, saving the right of the holy Roman church and that of Canterbury, I inhibit all persons of whatever dignity, be they king, or bishop, or earl, or prince, or any of my dependents, from daring to enter the bounds of Glastonbury, or of the above-named parishes, for the purpose of searching, seizing, holding courts, or doing anything to the prejudice of the servants of God there residing. The abbot and convent shall alone have power, in causes known and unknown, in small and in great, and in every thing as we have before related. And whosoever, upon any occasion, whatever be his dignity, whatever his order, whatever his profession, shall attempt to pervert or nullify the preeminency of this my privilege by sacrilegious boldness, let him be aware that he must doubtless, with fear and trembling, before the strict Judge, give account of it, unless he first endeavour to make reparation by proper satisfaction." The charter of this privilege the aforesaid king Edgar confirmed by a solemn writing at London, in the twelfth year of his reign, with the common consent of his nobles. And in the same year, which was the nine hundred and sixty-fifth¹ of our Lord's incarnation, and the fourteenth of the indiction, pope John,² in a general assembly, confirmed the said charter at Rome, and made all the men of chief dignity who presided at that council confirm it; and also, from motives of paternal regard, sent a letter to the following effect to earl Aluric, then grievously persecuting the aforesaid church.

§ 151. "John the bishop, servant of the servants of God, to Aluric the distinguished earl, and our dearly beloved son in the Spirit, perpetual health and apostolical benediction. We have learned from the report of certain faithful people, that you commit many enormities against the church of the holy mother of God, which is called Mary of Glastonbury, the chief in all Britain,³ and which is acknowledged to belong solely to, and to be under the protection of, the Roman pontiff from the earliest times; and that you have, with boundless greediness, seized upon its estates and possessions, and even the churches of Brente and Piltun,¹ which, by the instrumentality of king Ina, it legally possesses, together with other churches, that is to say, Sowie, Stret, Merlinc, Budecale, Sapewic; and that, on account of your near residence, you are constantly hostile to its interests. It however would have been becoming, from your living so near, that by your assistance the holy church of God might have been much benefited and enriched; but what is horrible, it is impoverished by your hostility, and injured by your oppression. And since we doubt not that we, though unworthily, have received from St. Peter the apostle the care of all churches, and solicitude for all things, we therefore admonish your affection to abstain from plundering it, for the love of the apostles Peter and Paul, and respect to us, invading none of its possessions, churches, chapels, vills, and estates; but if you persist, remember that, by the authority of the chief of the apostles committed to us, you shall be excommunicated and banished from the company of the faithful, subjected to a perpetual curse, and doomed to eternal fire with the traitor Judas."

§ 152. The monastic order, for a long time depressed, now joyfully reared its head; and hence it came to pass that our monastery also resumed its ancient liberties. But this, I think, will be more suitably related in the words of the king himself:—

§ 153. ² "I Edgar, king of all Albion, and exalted, by the subjection of the surrounding kings maritime or insular, through the bountiful grace of God, to an eminence never enjoyed by any of my progenitors, have often, mindful of so high an honour, diligently considered what offering I should more especially make from my earthly kingdom to the King of kings. In aid of my pious devotion, heavenly love suddenly insinuated to my watchful solicitude, that I should rebuild all the holy monasteries throughout my kingdom, which, as they were visibly ruined, with mouldering shingles and worm-eaten boards, even to the rafters, so, what was still worse, they had become internally neglected, and almost destitute of the service of God. Wherefore, ejecting those illiterate clerks subject to the discipline of no regular order, in many places I have appointed pastors of a holier race, that is, of the monastic order, supplying them with ample means out of my royal revenues to repair their churches wherever ruined; one of whom, by name Elvric, in all things a true priest, I have appointed guardian of that most celebrated monastery, which the Angles call by a twofold name Maldelmesburh; to which, for the benefit of my soul, and in honour of our Saviour, and the holy mother of God the ever virgin Mary, and the apostles Peter and Paul, and the amiable prelate Aldelm, I have restored, with munificent liberality, a portion of land¹ (and here he describes it) with meadows and woods. This, leased out by the aforesaid clerks, was unjustly held by the contentious Edelnoth; but his vain and subtle disputation being heard by my counsellors, and his false defence being, in my presence, nullified by them, I have restored it to the use of the monastery in the year of our Lord nine hundred and seventy-four, in the fourteenth of my reign, and the first of my royal consecration."²

§ 154. And here I deem it not irrelevant to commit to writing what was supernaturally shown to this king. He had entered a wood abounding with game, and, as usually happens, while his associates were dispersed in the thicket for the purpose of hunting, he was left alone; and so pursuing his course, he came to the outlet of the wood and stopped there, waiting for his companions. Shortly after, seized with an irresistible desire to sleep, he alighted from his horse, that the enjoyment of a wholesome repose might assuage the fatigue of the past day. He lay down, therefore, under a wild apple-tree, where the clustering branches had formed a shady canopy all around. A river flowing softly beside him, added to his fatigue, by its gentle murmurs soothed him to sleep, when a bitch of the hunting-breed, pregnant and lying down at his feet, terrified him while slumbering; for though the mother was silent, yet the whelps within her womb barked in various sonorous tones, incited, as it were, by a singular delight in the place of their confinement. Astonished at this prodigy, as he lifted up his eyes towards the summit of the tree, he saw first one apple, and then another, fall into the river, by the collision of which, the watery bubbles being put in commotion, a voice articulately sounded, "Well is thee." Soon after, driven by the rippling wave, a little pitcher appeared upon the stream, and after that a larger vessel overflowing with water (for the former was empty); and although, by the violence of the stream, the greater vessel pressed upon the lesser that it might discharge its waters into it, yet it ever happened that the pitcher escaped, still empty, and again, as in a haughty and insulting manner, attacked the larger. Returning home, as the Psalmist says,³ "He thought upon what had been done, and sought out his spirit." His mother addressed him, however, that she might cheer both his countenance and his heart, saying it should be her care to entreat God, who knew how to explain mysteries by the light of his inspiration. With this admonition he dispelled his grief and dismissed his anxiety, conscious of his mother's sanctity, to whom God had vouchsafed many revelations. Her name was Elfgifa, a woman intent on good works, and gifted with such affection and kindness that she would even secretly discharge the penalties of those culprits whom the sad sentence of the judges had publicly condemned. That costly clothing, which to many women is the pander of vice, was to her the means of liberality, as she would give a garment of the most beautiful workmanship to the first poor person she saw. Even malice itself, as there was nothing to carp at, might praise the beauty of her person and the work of her hands. Thoroughly comprehending the presage, she said to her son next morning, "The barking of the whelps while the mother was sleeping implies, that after your death, those persons, who are now living and in power, dying also, miscreants yet unborn will bark against the church of God. And whereas one apple followed the other, so that the voice, 'Well is thee,' seemed to proceed from the dashing of the second against the first, this implies that from you, who are now like a tree shading all England, two sons will proceed. The favourers of the second will destroy the first; when the chiefs of the different parties will say to each of the boys, 'Well is thee,' because the dead one will reign in heaven, the living one on earth. Forasmuch as the greater pitcher could not fill the smaller, this signifies that the Northern nations, which are more numerous than the English, shall attack England after your death; and although they may supply their losses by perpetual reinforcements of their countrymen, yet they shall never be able to fill this corner of the world, but instead of that, our Angles, when they seem to be completely subjugated, shall drive them out, and it shall remain under its own and God's governance, even unto the time before appointed by Christ."¹

§ 155. Further perusal will justify the truth of the presage. The manifest sanctity both of parent and child ought here to be considered; that the one should see a mystery when broad awake without impediment, and that the other should be able to solve the problem by the far discerning eye of prophecy. The rigour of Edgar's justice was equal to the sanctity of his manners, so that he permitted no person, be his dignity what it might, to elude the laws with impunity. In his time there was no private thief, no public freebooter, unless such as chose to venture the loss of life for their attacks upon the property of others.² How, indeed, can it be supposed that he would pass over the crimes of men, who designed to exterminate even every beast of prey from his kingdom; and commanded Judval, king of the Welsh, to pay him yearly a tribute of three hundred wolves? This he performed for three years, but omitted in the fourth, declaring that he could find no more.

§ 156. Although it is reported that he was extremely small, both in stature and in bulk, yet nature had condescended to enclose such strength in that diminutive body, that he would voluntarily challenge any person whom he knew to be bold and valiant to engage with him, and his greatest apprehension was, lest they should stand in awe of him in these encounters. Moreover, at a certain banquet, where the prating of coxcombs generally shows itself very freely, it is reported that Kinnad, king of the Scots, said in a sportive manner, that it seemed extraordinary to him how so many provinces should be subject to such a sorry little fellow. This was caught up with malignant ear by a certain mimic, and afterwards cast in Edgar's teeth, with the customary raillery of such people. But he, concealing the circumstance from his friends, sent for Kinnad, as if to consult him on some secret matter of importance, and leading him aside far into the recesses of a wood, he gave him one of two swords, which he had brought with him. "And now," said he, "as we are alone, you shall have an opportunity of proving your strength. I will now make it appear which of us two ought deservedly to command the other; nor shall you stir a foot till you try the matter with me, for it is disgraceful for a king to prate at a banquet, and not to be prompt in action." Confused, and not daring to utter a word, he fell at the feet of his sovereign lord, and asked pardon for what was merely a joke, which he immediately obtained. But what of this? Every summer, as soon as the festival of Easter was passed, he ordered his ships to be collected on each coast, cruising to the western part of the island with the eastern fleet; and (having returned from that expedition) with the western to the north, and then again with the northern squadron towards the east, affectionately vigilant lest pirates should disturb the country. During the winter and spring, riding through the provinces, he made inquiry into the decisions of men in power, severely avenging violated laws. By the latter proceeding, he watched over the administration of justice; by the former, military strength; and in both he consulted public utility.

§ 157. There are some persons, indeed, who endeavour to dim his exceeding glory by saying, that in his earlier years he was cruel to his subjects, and libidinous in respect of virgins. Their first accusation they exemplify thus. There was in his time one Athelwold, a nobleman of celebrity, and one of his confidants; him the king had commissioned to visit Elfrida, daughter of Orgar, duke of Devonshire, (whose charms had so fascinated the eyes of some persons that they commended her to the king,) and to offer her marriage if her beauty were really equal to report. Hastening on his embassy, and finding every thing consonant to general estimation, he concealed his mission from her parents, and procured the damsel for himself. Returning to the king, he told a tale which made for his own purpose, that she was a girl of vulgar and common-place appearance, and by no means worthy of such transcendent dignity. When Edgar's heart was disengaged from this affair, and employed on other amours, some tattlers acquainted him how completely Athelwold had duped him by his artifices. Driving out one nail with another, that is, returning him deceit for deceit, he showed the earl a fair countenance, and, as in a sportive manner, appointed a day when he would visit this far-famed lady. Terrified almost to death with this dreadful pleasantry, he hastened before to his wife, entreating that she would administer to his safety by attiring herself as unbecomingly as possible; then first disclosing the intention of such a proceeding. But what did not this woman dare? She was hardy enough to deceive the confidence of her miserable lover, her first husband, to adorn herself at the mirror, and to omit nothing which could stimulate the desire of a young and powerful man. Nor did events happen contrary to her design; for he fell so desperately in love with her the moment he saw her, that, dissembling his indignation, he sent for the earl into a wood at Warewelle,¹ under pretence of hunting, and ran him through with a javelin. When the illegitimate son of the murdered nobleman approached with his accustomed familiarity, and was asked by the king how he liked that kind of sport, he is reported to have said, "Well, my sovereign liege, I ought not to be displeased with that which gives you pleasure," with which answer he so assuaged the mind of the raging monarch, that for the remainder of his life he held no one in greater estimation than this young man, mitigating the offence of his tyrannical deed against the father by royal solicitude for the son. In expiation of this crime, a monastery, which was built on the spot by Elfrida, is inhabited by a large congregation of nuns.

§ 158. To this instance of cruelty they add a second of lust. Hearing of the beauty of a certain virgin who was dedicated to God, he carried her off from a monastery by force, ravished her, and repeatedly made her partner of his bed. When this circumstance reached the ears of St. Dunstan, he was vehemently reprov'd by him, and underwent a seven years' penance; though a king, submitting to fast and to forego the wearing of his crown for that period.²

§ 159. They add a third, in which both vices may be discovered. King Edgar coming to Andover, a town not far from Winchester, ordered the daughter of a certain nobleman, the fame of whose beauty had been loudly extolled, to be brought to him. The mother of the young lady, shocked at the proposed concubinage of her daughter, assisted by the darkness of night, placed an attendant in his bed—a maiden, indeed, neither deficient in elegance nor in understanding. The night having passed, when Aurora was hastening into day, the woman attempted to rise; and being asked why she was in such haste? she replied, to perform the daily labour of her mistress. Retained, though with difficulty, on her knees, she bewailed her wretched situation to the king, and entreated her freedom as the recompense of her connexion with him, saying that it became his greatness not to suffer one who had ministered to his royal pleasure any longer to groan under the commands of cruel masters. His indignation being excited, and sternly smiling, while his mind was wavering between pity to the girl and displeasure to her mistress, he at last, as if treating the whole as a joke, released her from servitude, and dismissed his anger. Soon after he exalted her, with great honour, to be mistress of her former tyrants, whether they liked it or not; he loved her entirely, nor left her bed till he took Elfrida, the daughter of Orgar, to be his legitimate wife. Elfrida bore him Edmund,¹ who dying five years before his father, lies buried at Rumsey; and Egelred, who reigned after him. Besides, by Egeflæda, surnamed the Fair, the daughter of the most powerful duke Ordmer, he begat Edward; and St. Edgitha, of Wulfrida, who it is certain was not a nun at that time, but being a lay virgin, had assumed the veil through fear of the king, though she was immediately afterwards forced to the royal bed; on which St. Dunstan, offended that he should desire lustfully a person who had been even the semblance of a nun, exerted the pontifical power against him.

§ 160. But however these things may be, this is certain, that from the sixteenth year of his age,² when he was appointed king, till the thirtieth, he reigned without the insignia of royalty. But then, the princes and men of every order assembling from all parts, he was crowned with great pomp at Bath, on the day of Pentecost; he survived only three years, and was buried at Glastonbury. Nor is it to be forgotten, that when abbot Eilward opened his tomb in the year of our Lord ten hundred and fifty-two, he found the body unconscious of corruption. This circumstance, instead of inclining him to reverence, served only to increase his audacity; for when the receptacle which he had prepared seemed too small to admit the body, he profaned the royal corpse by cutting it; the blood immediately gushing out in torrents, struck terror into the hearts of the bystanders. In consequence, his royal remains were placed above the altar, in a shrine which he had himself given to this church, with the head of St. Apollinaris, and the reliques of Vincent the martyr, which, purchased at a great price, he had added to the beauty of the house of God. The violator of the sacred body presently became distracted, and not long after, going out of the church, met his death by a broken neck. Nor did the display of royal sanctity stop thus; it proceeded still further, a man, lunatic and blind, being cured. Deservedly then does the report prevail among the English, that no king, either of his own or former times in England, could be justly and fairly compared to Edgar. Nothing could be more holy than his life, nothing more praiseworthy than his justice, those vices excepted which he afterwards obliterated by abundant virtues: a man who rendered his country illustrious through his distinguished courage, and the brilliancy of his actions, as well as by the increase of the servants of God. After his death,³ the state and the hopes of the English met with a reverse.

³ King Edgar died on Thursday, 8th of July, A. D. 975.

Of Edward, second of that name, the Martyr.

§ 161. In the year of our Lord's incarnation nine hundred and seventy-five, Edward the son of Edgar began to reign, and enjoyed the sovereignty for three years and a half. Dunstan, in common consent with the other bishops, elevated him to the royal dignity, in opposition, as it is said, to the will of some of the nobility and of his stepmother, who was anxious to advance her son Egelred, a child scarcely seven years of age, in order that herself might govern under colour of his name. Then, from the increasing malice of men, the happiness of the kingdom was impaired. Then, too, a comet was seen, which was asserted surely to portend either pestilence to the inhabitants, or a change in the government. Nor was it long ere there followed a failure of the crops, famine among men, murrain among cattle. An extraordinary accident happened at a royal town called Calne. For as soon as Edgar was dead, the secular canons who had been formerly expelled from the churches, rekindled the former feuds, alleging that it was a great and serious disgrace for new-comers to drive the ancient inmates from their dwellings;¹ that it could not be esteemed grateful to God, who had granted them their ancient habitations; neither could it be so to any considerate man, who might dread that injustice as likely to befall himself which he had seen overtake others. Hence they proceeded to clamour and rage, and hastened to Dunstan; the principal people, as is the custom of the laity, exclaiming more especially, that the injury which the canons had wrongfully suffered ought to be redressed by gentler measures. Moreover one of them, Elferius, with more than common audacity, had even overturned almost all the monasteries which the most reverend Adewold² had built throughout Mercia. On this account a full synod being convened, they first assembled at Winchester.³ What was the issue of the contest at that place other writings declare;⁴ relating that the image of our Saviour, speaking decidedly, confounded the canons and their party. But men's minds being not yet at rest on the subject, a council was called at Calne, where, when all the senators of England (the king being absent on account of his youth) had assembled in an upper chamber, and the business was agitated with much animosity and debate, while the weapons of harsh reproach were directing against that firmest bulwark of

⁴ When the question was agitated whether the monks should be supported, or the canons restored, the crucifix is said to have exclaimed, "Far be it from you; you have done well; to change again would be wrong." See Eadmer and Osberne, Angl. Sacr. ii. 112.

the church, I mean Dunstan, but could not shake it, and men of every rank were earnestly defending their several sides of the question, the floor with its beams and supporters gave way suddenly, and fell to the ground. All fell with it except Dunstan, who alone escaped unhurt, by standing on a single rafter which retained its position: the rest were either killed or maimed for life. This miracle procured the archbishop peace on the score of the canons, all the English, both at that time and afterwards, yielding to his sentiments.

§ 162. Meanwhile king Edward conducted himself with becoming affection to his infant brother and his stepmother; retained only the name of king, and gave them the power; followed the footsteps of his father's piety, and gave both his attention and his heart to good counsel. The woman, however, with a stepmother's hatred, began to meditate a subtle stratagem, in order that not even the title of king might be wanting to her child, and to lay a treacherous snare for her son-in-law, which she accomplished in the following manner. He was returning home, tired with the chase, and gasping with thirst from the exercise, while his companions were following the dogs in different directions as it happened, when hearing that they dwelt in a neighbouring mansion, the youth proceeded thither at full speed, unattended and unsuspecting, as he judged of others by his own feelings. On his arrival, alluring him to her with female blandishment, she made him fix his attention upon herself, and after saluting him, while he was eagerly drinking from the cup which had been presented, the dagger of an attendant pierced him through. Dreadfully wounded, with all his remaining strength he spurred his horse in order to join his companions; when one foot slipping, he was dragged by the other through the winding paths, while the streaming blood gave evidence of his death to his followers. Moreover, they then commanded him to be ingloriously interred at Wareham,¹ grudging him even holy ground when dead, as they had envied him his royal dignity while living. They now publicly manifested their extreme joy, as if they had buried his memory with his body; but God's all-seeing eye was there, who ennobled the innocent victim by the glory of miracles; so much is human outweighed by heavenly judgment, for lights were there shown from above. There the lame walked; there the dumb resumed his faculty of speech; there every malady gave way to health. The fame of this pervading all England, proclaimed the merits of the martyr. The murderess, excited by it, attempted a progress thither; and was already urging forward the horse she had mounted, when she perceived the manifest anger of God; for the same animal which she had heretofore constantly ridden, and which was used to outstrip the very winds in speed, now by the command of God stood motionless. The attendants, both with whips and clamours, urged him forward, that he might carry his noble mistress with his usual readiness. Their labour was vain; they changed the horse, and the same circumstance recurred. Her obdurate heart, though late, perceived the meaning of the miracle; wherefore, what she was not herself permitted to do, she suffered to be performed by another: for that Elferius, whom I before blamed for destroying the monasteries, repenting of his rashness, and being deeply distressed in mind, took up the sacred corpse from its unworthy burial-place, and paid it just and distinguished funeral honours at Shaftesbury: he did not however escape unpunished, for, within a year afterwards, he was eaten of the vermin which we call lice. Moreover, since a mind unregulated is a torment to itself, and a restless spirit endures its own peculiar punishment in this life, Elfrida declining from her regal pride, became extremely penitent; so that at Werewell, for many years, she clothed her pampered body in hair-cloth, slept at night upon the ground without a pillow, and mortified her flesh with every kind of penance. She was a beautiful woman, singularly faithful to her husband, but deserving punishment from the commission of so great a crime. It is believed and commonly reported, that from her violence to Edward the country, for a long time after, groaned under the yoke of barbarian servitude.

§ 163. At Shaftesbury truly shines a splendid proof of royal sanctity; for to his merit must it be attributed, that there a numerous choir of women, dedicated to God, not only enlighten those parts with the blaze of their religion, but even reach the very heavens. There reside sacred virgins wholly unconscious of contamination; there continent widows, ignorant of a second flame after the extinction of the first; in all whose manners graceful modesty is so blended with chastened elegance that nothing can exceed it. Indeed, it is matter of doubt which to applaud most, their assiduity in the service of God, or their affability in their converse with men; hence assent is justly given to those persons who say that the world, which has long tottered with the weight of its sins, is entirely supported by their prayers.

Of King Ethelred.

§ 164. In the year of our Lord's incarnation nine hundred and seventy nine,¹ Ethelred, son of Edgar and Elfrida, obtaining the kingdom, occupied rather than governed it for thirty-seven years. The career of his life is said to have been cruel in the beginning, wretched in the middle, and disgraceful in the end; for, in the murder to which he gave his concurrence, he was cruel, base in his flight and effeminacy, miserable in his death. Dunstan, indeed, had foretold his worthlessness, having discovered it by a very filthy token: for, when quite an infant, the bishops standing round, as he was immersed in the baptismal font, he defiled the sacraments by a natural evacuation,² at which Dunstan, being extremely angered, exclaimed, "By God and his mother, this will be a sorry fellow!" I have read that when he was ten years of age, hearing it noised abroad that his brother was killed, he so irritated his furious mother by his weeping, that, not having a whip at hand, she beat the little innocent with some candles she had snatched up; nor did she desist till herself bedewed him, nearly lifeless, with her tears. On this account he dreaded candles, during the rest of his life, to such a degree that he would never suffer the light of them to be brought into his presence. The nobility being assembled by the contrivance of his mother, and the day appointed upon which Dunstan, in right of his see, should crown him, he, though he might be ill-affected to them, forbore to resist, being a prelate of mature age, and long versed in secular matters. But, when placing the crown on his head, he could not refrain from giving vent, with a loud voice, to that prophetic spirit which he had so deeply imbibed. "Since,"¹ said he, "thou hast aspired to the kingdom by the death of thy brother, hear the word of God: Thus saith the Lord God, the sin of thy abandoned mother, and of the accomplices of her base design, shall not be washed out but by much blood of the wretched inhabitants; and such evils shall come upon the English nation as it hath never suffered from the time it came to England till that time." Nor was it long after, that is, in his third year, that seven piratical vessels came to Southampton,² a port near Winchester, and depopulating the coast fled back to sea: this I have not passed over, because many reports are circulated among the English concerning these vessels.

² A similar story is related of the emperor Constantine the Fifth, who obtained the surname of Copronymus from his pollution of the baptismal font.

Of the Sloth of Ethelred, and the Invasion by the Danes.

§ 165. A secret enmity between the king and the bishop of Rochester had arisen from some unknown cause, in consequence of which he led an army against that city. It was signified to him by the archbishop, that he should desist from his fury, and not irritate St. Andrew, under whose guardianship that bishopric was; for as he was ever ready to pardon, so was he equally formidable to avenge. The bare message being held in contempt, he graced the intimation with money, and sent him a hundred pounds, that thus bought off he would raise the siege and retire. Taking the money, he sounded a retreat, and dismissed his army. Dunstan, astonished at the avarice of the man, sent messengers to him with the following words: "Since you have preferred silver to God, money to the apostle, and covetousness to me, the evils which God hath pronounced will shortly come upon you; but they will not come while I live, for this also hath God spoken." Soon after the death of this holy man,³ which was in the tenth year of his reign, the predictions speedily began to be fulfilled, and the prophecies to have their consummation. For the Danes infesting every port,⁴ and making descents on all sides with piratical agility,

so that it was not known where they could be opposed, it was advised by Siricius,¹ second archbishop after Dunstan, that money should repel those whom the sword could not; so a payment of ten thousand pounds satisfied the avarice of the Danes. This was an infamous precedent, and totally unworthy of men, to purchase liberty, which no violence can ever extirpate from a noble mind, by money. They now, indeed, abstained a short time from their incursions; but as soon as their strength was recruited by rest, they returned to their old practices. Such extreme apprehension had then seized the English, that there was not a thought of resistance: if any indeed, mindful of their ancient glory, made an attempt to oppose or engage them, they were unsuccessful, from the multitude of their enemies, and the desertion of their allies. The leader of revolt was one Elfric, whom the king had appointed to command the fleet. This base deserter, instead of trying his fortune as he ought, in a naval conflict, went over to the enemy on the night preceding the battle, having first apprised them by messengers what to provide against; and though the king, for this perfidious crime, ordered his son's eyes to be put out,² yet he returned again, and again deserted. All Northumbria being laid waste, the enemy was met in battle and put to flight. London³ was besieged, but honourably defended by its citizens. In consequence, the besiegers, severely suffering and in despair of taking the city, retired; and devastating the whole province to the eastward, compelled the king to pay a sum of money, amounting to sixteen thousand pounds: moreover, hostages being given, he caused their king Analaf to come to him, stood sponsor for him at the baptismal font, and soothing him with royal munificence, bound him by an oath that he should never return into England again. The evil, however, was not thus put to rest; for they could never provide against their enemies from Denmark, who sprang up afresh, like the heads of the hydra. A western province which is called Devonshire was laid waste, the monasteries destroyed, and the city of Exeter set on fire,⁴ Kent given up to plunder, the metropolitan city and seat of the patriarchs burnt, the holy patriarch himself,⁵ the most reverend Elfeg, carried away and bound in chains; and at last, when required to plunder his tenants in order to ransom himself,

² Elfgar, son of duke Elfric, was deprived of his sight by command of the king in the year 993.

and refusing to do so, he was stoned, struck with a hatchet, and glorified heaven with his soul. After he was murdered, God exalted him, insomuch that when the Danes, who had been instrumental to his death, saw that dead wood besmeared with his blood miraculously grew green again in one night, they ran eagerly to kiss his remains, and to bear them on their shoulders. Abating thus of their native pride, they suffered his sacred corpse to be carried to London. There it was honourably buried; and when taken up ten years afterwards, free from every taint of corruption, it conferred honour on his own cathedral.¹ To the present moment both its blood remains fresh, and its soundness unimpaired; and it is considered as a miracle, that a carcase should be divested of its vital spirit and yet not turn to decay. That I may not be tedious in mentioning severally all the provinces which the Danes laid waste, let it be summarily understood, that out of thirty-two counties which are reckoned in England, they had already overrun sixteen, the names of which I forbear to enumerate on account of the ruggedness of the language.

In the meantime the king, admirably calculated for sleeping, disregarding these important transactions, would only yawn; and if ever he recovered his senses enough to raise himself upon his elbow, he quickly relapsed into his original wretchedness, either from the oppression of indolence, or the adverseness of fortune. His brother's ghost also, demanding dire expiation, tormented him. Who can tell how often he collected his army? how often he ordered ships to be built? how frequently he called out commanders from all quarters, and yet nothing was ever effected? For the army, destitute of a leader, and ignorant of military discipline, either retreated before it came into action, or else was easily overcome. The presence of the leader is of much avail in battle. Courage manifested by him avails also; experience, and more especially discipline, avail much; and as I have said, an army destitute of these must be an irreparable injury to its countrymen, as well as a pitiable object of contempt to an enemy: for soldiers are a class of men who, unless restrained before the battle, are eager to plunder; and if not animated during it, prone to flight. When the ships, built for the defence of the sea-coast, were lying at anchor, a tempest suddenly arising dashed them together, and rendered them useless by the destruction of their tackle. A few, fitted from the wrecks of the others, were, by the attack of one Wulnod, whom the king had banished, either sunk or burnt, and consequently disappointed the expectations of all England. The commanders, if ever they met to confer, immediately chose different sides, and rarely or never united in one good plan; for they gave more attention to private quarrels than to public exigencies. If, in the midst of pressing danger, they had resolved on any eligible secret design, it was immediately communicated to the Danes by traitors: for besides Elfric, the successor of Elfere, who had murdered the late king, there was one Edric, a man infamously skilled in such transactions, whom the king had made governor of the Mercians, one of the refuse of mankind, and the reproach of the English; an abandoned glutton, a cunning miscreant, whom noble birth had provided with wealth, and who had increased it by specious language and impudence. This artful dissembler, capable of feigning anything, was accustomed, by pretended fidelity, to trace out the king's designs, that he might treacherously divulge them. Often, when despatched to the enemy as the mediator of peace, he inflamed them to battle. His perfidy was sufficiently conspicuous in this king's reign, but much more so in the next, of which I shall have occasion to speak hereafter. Ulkill, earl of the East Angles, was the only person who at that time resisted the invaders with any degree of spirit, insomuch that, although the enemy had nominally the victory, yet the conquerors are thought to have suffered much more than the conquered;¹ nor did it shame the barbarians to confess this truth, while they so frequently bewailed that victory. The valour of the earl was more conspicuously eminent, after the death of Edelred, in that battle which mowed down the whole flower of the province; where, when he was surrounded from the rear, deeming it disgraceful to fly, he gave fresh confidence to the king by his blood; but this happened some time after.²

At this juncture, that the measure of king Ethelred's misery might be full, a famine ravaged all England; and those whom war had spared, perished through want. The enemy overran the country with such freedom, that they would carry off their booty to their ships through a space of fifty miles, dreading no resistance from the inhabitants. In the midst of these pressing evils, the expedient of buying off hostilities by money was again debated, and accordingly adopted; for first twenty-four, and soon after thirty thousand pounds, were given, with what advantage succeeding times will show. To me indeed, deeply reflecting upon the subject, it seems wonderful how a man, who, as we have been taught to suppose, was neither very foolish, nor excessively cowardly, should pass his life in the wretched endurance of so many calamities. Should any one ask me the reason of this, I could not easily answer, except by saying that the revolt of the generals proceeded from the haughtiness of the king. Their perfidy has been spoken of before; I now hasten to instances of his violence, which was so intolerable that he spared not even his own relations. For besides the English, whom he despoiled of their hereditary possessions without any cause, or defrauded of their property for suppositious crimes; besides the Danes, whom upon light suspicion only he ordered to be all butchered on the same day throughout England,³ where was a dreadful spectacle to behold, each one compelled to betray his dearest guests, now become dearer from the tenderest connexions of affinity, and to cut short their embraces with the sword: yet besides all this, I say, he was so inconstant towards his wife, that he scarcely deigned her his bed, and degraded the royal dignity by his libidinous intercourse with harlots. She too, a woman conscious of her high descent, became indignant at her husband, as she found herself endeared to him neither by her blameless modesty nor her fruitfulness; for she had borne him two children, *Elfred*¹ and Edward. She was the daughter of Richard earl of Normandy,² the son of William, who, after his father, presided over that earldom for fifty-two years, and died in the eighteenth year of this king.³ He lies at the monastery of Fescamp, which he augmented with certain revenues, and which he adorned with a monastic order by means of William, formerly abbot of Dijon. Richard was a distinguished character, and had also often harassed Edelred; which, when it became known at Rome, the holy see, not enduring that two Christians should be at enmity, sent Leo bishop of Treves into England to effect a peace. The epistle⁴ describing this legation was as follows:—

The Epistle of John the Pope.

§ 166. ⁵ “John the fifteenth, pope of the holy Roman church, to all faithful people.

Be it known to all the faithful of holy mother church, and our children spiritual and secular dispersed through the several regions of the world, that inasmuch as we had been informed by many of the enmity between Edelred king of the West Saxons and Richard the marquis, and being sorely grieved at this on account of our spiritual children; taking therefore wholesome counsel, I summoned one of our legates, Leo, bishop of the holy church of Treves, and sent him with our letters, admonishing them that they should return from their ungodliness. He, passing vast spaces, at length crossed the sea, and on the day of the Lord's nativity came into the presence of the said king, whom having saluted on our part, he delivered to him the letters we had sent. And all the faithful people of his kingdom and the wiser persons of either order being summoned, he granted, for love and fear of God Almighty, and of St. Peter the chief of apostles, and on account of our paternal admonition, the firmest peace for all his sons and daughters present and future, and all his faithful people, without deceit. On which account he sent Edelsin, prelate of the holy church of Shireburn, and Leofstan son of Alfwold, and Edelnod son of Wistan, who passed the boundaries, and came to Richard the said marquis. He, peaceably receiving our admonitions, and hearing the determination of the said king, readily confirmed the peace for his sons and daughters present and future, and for all his faithful people, with this reasonable condition, that if any of their subjects, or they themselves, should commit any injustice against each other, it should be duly redressed, and that peace should remain for ever unshaken and confirmed by the oath of both parties: on the part of king Edelfred, to wit, Edelsin, prelate of the holy church of Shireburn, Leofstan the son of Alfwold, and Edelnod the son of Wistan; on the part of Richard, Roger the bishop, Rodolf son of Hugh, Turstenc the son of Turgis. Executed at Rouen, on the kalends of March [1st March], in the year of our Lord nine hundred and ninety-one, the fourth of the indiction. Moreover, of the king's subjects, or of his enemies, let Richard receive none, nor the king of his, without their respective seals."

Concerning Gerbert.

§ 167. On the death of this pope John, Gregory succeeded; and to him succeeded John XVI.; and to the latter succeeded Silvester, also called Gerbert:¹ and I conceive it will not be without its use if we commit to writing those circumstances which are related and universally spoken of him. Born in Gaul, from a lad he grew up to be a monk at Fleury; afterwards, when he arrived at the double path of Pythagoras,² either disgusted at a monastic life, or seized by lust of glory, he fled by night into Spain, chiefly designing to learn astrology and other sciences of that description from the Saracens. Spain, formerly for many years possessed by the Romans, in the time of the emperor Honorius fell under the power of the Goths. The Goths were Arians down to the days of St. Gregory, when that people were united to the catholic church by Leander bishop of Seville, and by king Ricared³ brother of Hermingild, whom his father slew on Easter night for professing the true faith.⁴ To Leander succeeded Isidore,⁵ celebrated for learning and sanctity, whose body, purchased for its weight in gold, Aldefonsus, king of

² The double path of Pythagoras is represented by the Greek γ , or the letter γ . "Pythagoræ bivium ramis patet ambiguis γ ." (Ausonius, Idyll. de Litter. Monosyll. xii. 9.) And Lactantius, vi. 6, says, "Dicunt humanæ vitæ cursum y litteræ esse similem; quia unusquisque hominum, cum primum adolescentiæ linaen attigerit, et in eum locum venerit partes ubi se via findit in ambas (Virg. A. vi. 540,) hæcat nutabundus."

Gallicia, in our times conveyed to Toledo. The Saracens, who had subjugated the Goths, being conquered in their turn by Charles the Great, lost Gallicia and Lusitania, the largest provinces of Spain; but to this day they possess the southern parts. As the Christians esteem Toledo, so do they hold Hispalis, which they commonly call Seville, to be the capital of the kingdom, practising divinations and incantations after the usual mode of that nation. Gerbert then, as I have related, coming among these people, satisfied his desires. There he surpassed Ptolemy with the astrolabe, and Alandræus in astronomy, and Julius Firmicus¹ in judicial astrology. There he learnt what the singing and the flight of birds portended; there he acquired the art of calling up spirits from hell; in short, whatever, hurtful or salutary, human curiosity has discovered; for there is no necessity to speak of his progress in the lawful sciences of arithmetic, music, astronomy, and geometry, which he imbibed so thoroughly as to show they were beneath his talents, and which, with great perseverance, he revived in Gaul, where they had for a long time been wholly obsolete. Being certainly the first who adopted the use of the abacus² from the Saracens, he gave rules which are scarcely understood even by laborious arithmeticians. He resided with a certain philosopher of that sect, whose good will he had obtained, first by great liberality, and then by promises. The Saracen had no objection to sell his knowledge; he frequently associated with him, would talk of matters at times serious, at others trivial, and lend him books to transcribe. There was, however, one volume, containing the knowledge of his whole art, which he could never by any means entice him to lend. In consequence, Gerbert burnt with anxious desire to obtain this book at any cost; "for we ever press more eagerly towards what is forbidden, and that which is denied is always esteemed more valuable."³ Trying therefore the effect of entreaty, he besought him for the love of God and by his friendship; he offered him many things, and promised him more. When this failed, he tried a nocturnal stratagem. Attacking him with wine, his daughter conniving at the attempt through the intimacy which Gerbert's attentions had procured, he stole the book from under his pillow, and fled. Waking suddenly, the Saracen pursued the fugitive by the direction of the stars, in which art he was well versed. The fugitive too, looking back and discovering his danger by means of the same art, hid himself under a wooden bridge which was near at hand, clinging to it and hanging in such a manner as neither to touch earth nor water. In this manner, the eagerness of the pursuer being eluded, he returned home. Gerbert then quickening his pace, arrived at the sea-coast. Here, by his incantations, calling up the devil, he made an agreement with him to be under his dominion for ever, if he would defend him from the Saracen, who was again pursuing, and transport him to the opposite coast: this was accordingly done. Probably some person may regard all this as a fiction, because the vulgar are used to undermine the fame of scholars, saying that the man who excels in any admirable science holds converse with the devil. Of this Boethius, in his book On the Consolation of Philosophy,¹ complains; and affirms that he had the discredit of such practices on account of his ardent love of literature, as if he had polluted his knowledge by detestable arts for the sake of ambition. "It was hardly likely," says he, "that I, whom you dress up with such excellence as almost to make me like God, should catch at the protection of the vilest spirits; but it is in this point that we approach nearest to a connexion with them, in that we are instructed in your learning, and educated in your customs." So far Boethius. The singular choice of his death confirms me in the belief² of his league with the devil; for why, when dying, as we shall relate hereafter,³ should he, gladiator-like, maim his own person, unless conscious of some unusual crime? Accordingly, in an old volume which accidentally fell into my hands, wherein the names and years of all the popes are entered, I found written to the following purport:—"Sylvester, who was also called Gerbert, four years, one month, ten days· this man made a shameful end."

Of Gerbert's Scholars.

§ 168. Gerbert returning into Gaul, became a public professor, and taught in the schools. His brother philosophers and companions of his studies were, Constantine, abbot of the monastery of St. Maximin, near Orleans, to whom he addressed The Rules of the Abacus,⁴ and Adelbold, bishop, as they say, of Winteburg, who himself gave proof of ability, in a letter which he wrote to Gerbert on a question concerning the diameter in Macrobius,⁵ and in some other points. He had pupils, of exquisite talents and noble origin, namely Robert, son of Hugh surnamed Capet; and Otho, son of the emperor Otho. Robert, afterwards king of France, made a suitable return to his master, and appointed him archbishop of Rheims. In that church are still extant,⁶ as proofs of his science, a clock¹ constructed on mechanical principles; and a hydraulic organ, in which the air, escaping in a surprising manner by the force of heated water, fills the cavity of the instrument, and the brazen pipes emit modulated tones² through the numerous apertures. The king himself, too, was well skilled in sacred music, and in this and many other respects a liberal benefactor to the church. Moreover, he composed that beautiful sequence, "The grace of the Holy Spirit be with us;" and the response, "O Judah and Jerusalem;" together with more which I should have pleasure in relating, were it not irksome to others to hear. Otho, emperor of Italy after his father, made Gerbert archbishop of Ravenna, and finally pope of Rome. He followed up his fortune so successfully, by the assistance of the devil,³ that he left nothing unexecuted which he had once conceived. The treasures formerly buried by the inhabitants, he discovered by the art of necromancy, and removing the rubbish, applied them to his own desires. Thus viciously disposed are the wicked towards God, and thus they abuse his patience, though He had rather that they repent than perish. At last he found where his master would stop, and as the proverb says, "in the same manner as one crow picks out another crow's eyes," while endeavouring to oppose his attempts with art like his own.

How Gerbert discovered the Treasures of Octovian.

§ 169. There was a statue in the Campus Martius near Rome, I know not whether of brass or iron, having the forefinger of the right hand extended, and on the head was written, "Strike here." The men of former times supposing this should be understood as if they might find a treasure there, had battered the harmless statue by repeated strokes of a hatchet; but Gerbert convicted them of error by solving the problem in a very different manner. Marking where the shadow of the finger fell at noonday, when the sun was at its height, he there placed a post; and at night proceeded thither, attended only by a servant carrying a lantern. The earth opening by means of his accustomed arts, displayed to them a spacious entrance. They saw before them a vast palace, with golden walls, golden roofs, everything of gold; golden soldiers amusing themselves, as it were, with golden dice; a king of the same metal, reclining with his queen; delicacies set before them, and servants waiting; vessels of great weight and value, in which the sculpture surpassed nature herself. In the inmost part of the mansion, a carbuncle of the first quality, though small in appearance, dispelled the darkness of night. In the opposite corner stood a boy, holding a bow bent, and the arrow drawn to the head. While the exquisite art of everything ravished the eyes of the spectators, there was nothing which it was lawful to handle, though it might be seen; for immediately as one stretched forth his hand to touch anything, all these figures appeared to rush forward and repel such presumption. Alarmed at this, Gerbert repressed his inclination; but the servant could not refrain from snatching off from a table a knife of admirable workmanship, supposing that, in a booty of such magnitude, so small a theft could hardly be discovered. In an instant, the figures all starting up with loud clamour, the boy discharged his arrow at the carbuncle, and in a moment clad all in darkness; and had he not, by the advice of his master, quickly thrown back the knife, they would have both suffered severely. In this manner, their boundless avarice unsatiated, they departed, the lanthorn directing their steps. That he performed such things by unlawful devices, is the generally received opinion. Yet, however, if any one diligently investigate the truth, he will see that even Solomon, to whom God himself had given wisdom, was not ignorant of these arts: for, as Josephus relates,¹ he, in conjunction with his father, buried vast treasures in coffers, which were hidden, as he says, in a kind of necromantic manner under ground; neither was Hircanus, celebrated for his skill in prophecy and his valour, who, to ward off the distress of a siege, dug up by the same art three thousand talents of gold from the sepulchre of David, and gave part of them to the besiegers, with the remainder building an hospital for the reception of strangers. But Herod, who would make an attempt of the same kind, with more presumption than knowledge, lost in consequence many of his attendants by an irruption of internal fire. Besides, when I hear the Lord Jesus saying, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," I believe that He who gave to Solomon power over demons to such a degree, as the same historian declares, that he relates there were men even in his time who could eject them from persons possessed, by applying to the nostrils of the patient a ring having the impression pointed out by Solomon,—I believe, I say, that He could give also the same science to this man; but I do not affirm that he did give it.

³ Mabillon imagined that this fable originated with cardinal Benno, and was inconsiderately adopted by subsequent writers.

How certain Persons sought for the Treasures of Octovian.

§ 170. But leaving these matters to my readers, I shall relate what I recollect having heard when I was a boy, from a certain monk of our house, a native of Aquitaine, a man in years, and a physician by profession. "When I was seven years old," said he, "despising the mean circumstances of my father, a poor citizen of Barcelona, I surmounted the snowy Alps and went into Italy. There, as was to be expected in a boy of that age, seeking my daily bread in great distress, I paid more attention to the food of my mind than of my body. As I grew up, I eagerly viewed many of the wonders of that country, and impressed them on my memory: among others I saw a perforated mountain, beyond which the inhabitants had from early times supposed that the treasures of Octovian were hidden. Many persons were reported to have entered into these caverns for the purpose of exploring them, and to have there perished, being bewildered by the intricacy of the ways. But, as hardly any apprehension can restrain avaricious minds from their intent, I with my companions, about twelve in number, meditated an expedition of this nature, either for the sake of plunder, or through curiosity. Imitating, therefore, the ingenuity of Dædalus, who brought Theseus out of the Labyrinth by a conducting clue, we also, carrying a large ball of thread, fixed a small post at the entrance. Tying the end of the thread to it, and lighting lanthorns, lest darkness as well as intricacy should obstruct us, we unrolled the clue; and fixing a post at every mile, we proceeded on our journey along the caverns of the mountain in the best manner we were able. Everything was dark and big with horror; the bats, flitting from holes, dashed against our eyes and faces; the path was narrow, and made dreadful on the left hand by a precipice, and a river flowing beneath it. We saw the way bestrewed with bare bones; we wept over the carcasses of men yet in a state of putrefaction, who, induced by hopes similar to our own, had in vain attempted, after their entrance, to return. After some time, however, and many alarms, arriving at the further outlet, we beheld a lake of softly murmuring waters, where the wave came gently rolling to the shores. A bridge of brass united the opposite banks: beyond the bridge were seen golden horses of great size, mounted by golden riders, and all those other things which are related by Gerbert: and the mid-day sun darting upon them with redoubled splendour, dazzled the eyes of the beholders. Seeing these things at a distance, we should have been delighted with a nearer view, meaning, if fate would permit, to carry off some portion of the precious metal. Animating each other in turn, we prepared to pass over the lake. All our efforts, however, were vain; for as soon as one of the company, more forward than the rest, had put his foot on the hither edge of the bridge, immediately (wonderful to hear) it became depressed, and the further edge was elevated, bringing forward a rustic of brass armed with a brazen club, with which, dashing the waters, he so clouded the air as completely to obscure both the day and the heavens. The moment the foot was withdrawn, peace was restored: the like attempt was made by many of us, with exactly the same result. Despairing, then, of getting over, we stood there some little time; and, as long as we could, at least glutted our eyes with the gold. Soon after, returning by the guidance of the thread, we found a silver dish, which being cut in pieces and distributed in morsels, only irritated the thirst of our avidity without allaying it. Consulting together the next day, we went to a professor of that time, who was said to know the unutterable name of God. When questioned, he did not deny his knowledge, adding that so great was the power of that name that no magic, no witchcraft, could resist it. Hiring him at a great price, fasting and confessed, he led us, prepared in the same manner, to a fountain. Taking up some water from it in a silver vessel, he silently traced the letters with his fingers, until we understood by our eyes what was unutterable with our tongues. We then went confidently to the mountain, but we found the further outlet beset as I believe with devils, hating, forsooth, the name of God, which was able to destroy their inventions. In the morning a Jew necromancer came to me, excited by the report of our attempt; and having inquired into the matter, when he heard of our want of enterprise, 'You shall see,' said he, venting his spleen with loud laughter, 'how far the power of my art can prevail.' And immediately entering the mountain, he soon after came out again, bringing, as a proof of his having passed the lake, many things which I had noted beyond it; indeed, some of that most precious dust, which turned everything touched by it into gold—not that it was really so, but only retained this appearance until washed with water; for nothing effected by necromancy can, when put into water, deceive the sight of the beholders. The truth of my assertion is confirmed by a circumstance which happened about the same time.

§ 171. "There were in a public street leading to Rome two old women, than whom nothing could be more drunken or filthy, both living in the same hut, and both practising witchcraft. If any lone stranger happened to come in their way, they used to make him appear either a horse, or a sow, or some other animal, expose him for sale to dealers, and gluttonize with the money. By chance, on a certain night, taking in a lad to lodge who got his livelihood by stage-dancing, they turned him into an ass; thus possessing a creature extremely advantageous to their interests, who caught the eyes of such as passed by the strangeness of his postures, for in whatever mode the old woman commanded, the ass began to dance. He retained, however, his understanding, though he had lost the power of speech. In this manner the women had accumulated much money, for there was daily a large concourse of people from all parts to see the tricks of the ass. The report of this induced a rich neighbour to purchase the quadruped for a considerable sum; and he was warned that, would he have him as a constant dancer, he must keep him from water. The person who had charge of him rigidly fulfilled his orders. A long time elapsed; the ass sometimes gratified his master by his reeling motions, and sometimes entertained his friends with his tricks. But, however, as in time all things surfeit, he began at length to be less cautiously observed. In consequence of this negligence, breaking his halter, he got loose, plunged into a pool hard by, and rolling for a long time in the water, recovered his human form. The keeper inquiring of all he met, and pursuing him by the track of his feet, asked him if he had seen an ass. He replied that himself had been an ass, but was now a man, and related the whole transaction. The servant astonished told it to his master, and the master to pope Leo, the holiest man in our times. The old women were convicted, and confessed the fact. The pope doubting this, was assured by Peter Damian, a learned man, that it was not wonderful that such things should be done : and by instancing the example of Simon Magus,¹ who caused Faustinianus to assume the figure of Simon, and to become an object of terror to his sons, he rendered his holiness better skilled in such matters for the future."

Of the Statue with a Speaking Head.

§ 172. I have inserted this narrative of the Aquitanian to the intent that, what is reported of Gerbert should not seem wonderful to any person ; which is, that he cast, for his own purposes, the head of a statue, by a certain inspection of the stars when all the planets were about to begin their courses, which spake not unless spoken to, but then pronounced the truth either in the affirmative or negative. For instance, when Gerbert would say, " Shall I be pope ?" the statue would reply, " Yes ;" " Am I to die, ere I sing mass at Jerusalem ?" " No :" they relate, that he was so much deceived by this ambiguity, that he thought nothing of repentance ; flattering himself with the prospect of a very long life : for when would he think of going to Jerusalem to accelerate his own death ? Nor did he foresee that at Rome there is a church called Jerusalem, that is, " the vision of peace," because whoever flies thither finds safety, be he guilty of whatsoever crime. We have heard that this was called the Asylum in the very infancy of the city, because Romulus, to increase the number of his subjects, had appointed it to be a refuge for the guilty of every description. The pope sings mass there on three Sundays, which are called " The station at Jerusalem." Wherefore when upon one of those days Gerbert was preparing himself for mass, he suddenly complained of feeling ill ; growing worse, he took to his bed : and consulting his statue, he became convinced of its delusion and of his own approaching death. Calling, therefore, the cardinals together, he lamented his crimes for a long space of time. They being struck with sudden fear and unable to make any reply, raving, and losing his reason through excess of pain, he commanded himself to be cut into pieces, and cast forth piecemeal, saying, " Let him have the service of my limbs, who before sought their homage ; for my mind never consented to that oath, nay, that abomination."

§ 173. And since I have wandered from my subject, I think it may not be unpleasant were I to relate what took place in Saxony in the time of this king, in the year of our Lord one thousand and twelve, and which is not generally known. It is better to dilate on such matters than to dwell on Ethelred's indolence and calamities : and it will be more pleasing certainly, and nearer the truth, if I subjoin it in the original language of the person who was a sufferer, than if I had clothed it in my own words. Besides, I think it ornamental to a work, that the style be occasionally varied.

Of the Dancing Men and Women.

§ 174. "I Otbert, a sinner, were I desirous of concealing the divine judgment which overtook me, yet the tremor of my limbs would betray me; wherefore I shall relate circumstantially how this happened, that all may know the heavy punishment due to disobedience. We were, on the vigil of our Lord's Nativity, in a certain town of Saxony, in which was the church of Magnus the Martyr, where a priest named Rotbert had begun the first mass. I was in the churchyard with eighteen companions, fifteen men and three women, dancing, and singing profane songs to such a degree that I interrupted the priest, and our voices resounded amid the sacred solemnity of the mass. Wherefore, having commanded us to be silent, and not being attended to, he cursed us in the following words, 'May it please God and St. Magnus, that you may remain singing in that manner for a whole year.' His words had their effect. The son of John the priest seized his sister, who was singing with us, by the arm, and immediately tore it from her body; but not a drop of blood flowed out. She also remained a whole year with us, dancing and singing. The rain fell not upon us; nor did cold, nor heat, nor hunger, nor thirst, nor fatigue assail us: we neither wore out our clothes nor shoes, but we kept on singing as though we had been insane. First we sunk into the ground up to our knees, next to our thighs; a covering was at length, by the permission of God, built over us to keep off the rain. When a year had elapsed, Herbert, bishop of the city of Cologne, released us from the tie wherewith our hands were bound, and reconciled us before the altar of St. Magnus. The daughter of the priest, with the other two women, died immediately; the rest of us slept three whole days and nights: some died afterwards, and are famed for miracles: the remainder betray their punishment by the trembling of their limbs." This narrative was given to us by the Lord Peregrine, the successor of the blessed Herbert, in the year of our Lord one thousand and thirteen.

§ 175. In that city—which formerly was called Agrippina, from Agrippa, the son-in-law of Augustus, but afterwards named Colonia, by the emperor Trajan, because being there created emperor he founded in it a colony of Roman citizens;—in this city, I repeat, there was a certain bishop, famed for piety, though hideous in his person; of whom I shall relate one miracle, which he predicted when dying, after having first recorded what a singular chance elevated him to such an eminent station. The emperor of that country going to hunt on Quinquagesima Sunday, came alone, (for his companions were dispersed,) to the edge of a wood where this rural priest, deformed and almost a monster, had a church. The emperor feigning himself a soldier, humbly begs a mass, which he immediately begins. The other in the meantime was revolving in his mind, why God, from whom all beautiful things proceed, should suffer so deformed a man to administer his sacraments. Presently, when that verse in the Tract occurred, "Know ye that the Lord he is God," the priest, chiding the inattention of an assistant, looked behind him, and with a louder voice, replied, as it were, to the emperor lost in thought, saying, "It is He who hath made us; and not we ourselves." Struck with this expression, the emperor, esteeming him a prophet, exalted him, though unwilling and reluctant, to the archbishopric; which, when he had once assumed, he dignified by his exemplary conduct; kindly encouraging those who did well, and branding with the stigma of excommunication such as did otherwise, without respect of persons. The inhabitants of that place proclaim a multitude of his impartial acts; one of which the reader will peruse in that abbreviated form which my work requires.

In a monastery of nuns in that city, there was a certain virgin who had there grown up, more by the kindness of her parents than through any innate wish for an holy life: this girl, by the attraction of her beauty and her affable language to all, allured many lovers; but while others, through fear of God or the censure of the world, restrained their desires, there was one, who, excited to wantonness by the extent of his wealth and the nobility of his descent, broke through the bounds of law and of justice, and despoiled her of her virginity; and carrying her off he kept her as his lawful wife. Much time elapsed while the abbess entreated, and his friends admonished him not to persevere in so dreadful a crime; but he, turning a deaf ear however to his advisers, continued as immovable as a rock. By chance at this time the prelate was absent, occupied in business at Rome: but on his return the circumstance was related to him: he commands the sheep to be returned to the fold directly; and after much altercation the woman was restored to the monastery: but not long after, watching an opportunity when the bishop was absent, she was again carried away. Excommunication was then denounced against the delinquent, so that no person could speak to, or associate with him. Holding it in contempt, however, he retired to one of his estates afar off, not to submit to the sentence but to elude its power, and there, a turbulent and powerful man, he lived in company with his excommunicated paramour. But when it pleased God to call the bishop to heaven, and he was lying in extreme bodily pain upon his bed, the neighbours flocked around him, that they might partake the final benediction of this holy man, The offender alone not daring to appear, prevailed on some persons to speak for him. The moment the bishop heard his name he groaned, and then, (I add his very words,) spoke to the following effect, "If that wretched man shall desert that accursed woman, let him be absolved; but if he persist, let him be ready to give account before God, next year, at the very day and hour on which I shall depart; moreover, you will see me expire when the bell shall proclaim the sixth hour." Nor were his words vain: as he departed at the time he had predicted: and the other, together with his mistress, at the expiration of the year, on the same day, and at the same hour, was killed by a stroke of lightning.

§ 176. But king Ethelred, after the martyrdom of St. Elfeg, as we have related,¹ gave his see to a bishop named Living.² Moreover, Turkill, the Dane, who had been the chief cause of the archbishop's murder, had settled in England, and held the East Angles in subjection. For, the other Danes exacting from the English a tribute of eight thousand pounds, had distributed themselves, as best suited their convenience, in the towns, or in the country; and fifteen of their ships, with the crews, had entered into the king's service. In the meantime Turkill sent messengers to Suane, king of Denmark, inviting him to come to England, telling him that the land was rich and fertile, but the king a driveller; and that, wholly given up to wine and women, his last thoughts were those of war; that in consequence he was hateful to his own people and contemptible to foreigners; that the commanders were jealous of each other, the people weak, and that they would fly from the field the moment the onset was sounded.

§ 177. Suane³ was naturally cruel, nor did he require much persuasion; preparing his ships, therefore, he hastened his voyage. Sandwich was the port he made, principally designing to avenge his sister Gunhildis. This woman, who possessed considerable beauty, had come over to England with her husband Palling, a powerful nobleman, and embracing Christianity had made herself a pledge of the Danish peace. In his ill-fated fury, Edric had commanded her to be beheaded with the other Danes, though she declared that the shedding her blood would bring great evils on the whole kingdom. She bore her death with fortitude, neither turning pale at the time of execution, nor, when dead and her blood exhausted, did she lose her beauty; her husband was murdered before her face, and her son, a youth of amiable disposition, was transfixt with four spears. Suane then proceeding through East Anglia against the Northumbrians, received their submission without resistance; not indeed that the native ardour of their minds, which brooked no master, had grown cool; but because Uhtred,⁴ their prince, was the first to give example of desertion. On their submission, all the other people who inhabit England on the north gave him tribute and hostages. Coming southward, he compelled those of Oxford and Winchester to obey his commands; the Londoners⁵ alone protecting their lawful sovereign within their walls, shut their gates against him. The Danes, on the other hand, assailing with greater ferocity, nurtured their fortitude with the hope of fame. The townsmen were ready to meet death for freedom's sake, thinking they would never be forgiven should they desert their king, who had committed his life to their charge. While the conflict was raging fiercely on either side, victory befriended the juster cause; for the citizens made wonderful exertions, every one esteeming it glorious to show his unwearied alacrity to his prince, or even to die for him. One part of the enemy was destroyed, and another part drowned in the river Thames, because in their headlong fury they had not a bridge. With his shattered army Suane retreated to Bath, where Ethelmer, governor of the western district, with his followers, submitted to him. And, although all England was already stooping to his dominion, yet not even now would the Londoners have yielded, had not Ethelred withdrawn his presence from among them; for, being a man given up to indolence, and, through consciousness of his own misdeeds, supposing none could be faithful to him, and at the same time wishing to escape the difficulties of a battle and a siege, he by his departure left them to their own exertions. However, applying the best remedy they could to their exigencies, they surrendered after the example of their countrymen. They were men laudable in the extreme, and such as Mars himself would not have disdained to encounter, had they possessed a competent leader; for even while they were supported by the mere shadow of one, they risked every chance of battle, nay, even a siege of several months' continuance. He, in the meantime, giving fresh instance of his constitutional indolence, fled from the city, and arriving by secret journeys at Southampton, he passed over to the Isle of Wight. Here he addressed those abbots and bishops, who, even in such difficulties, could not bring themselves to desert their master, to the following effect: That they must perceive in what dreadful state his affairs and those of his subjects were; that he was banished from his paternal throne by the treachery of his generals, and that he, in whose hands their safety was formerly vested, now required the assistance of others; that though lately a monarch and a potentate, he was now a fugitive and an outcast—a melancholy change for him, because it certainly is more tolerable never to have had power, than to have lost it when possessed; and more especially disgraceful to the English, as this instance of their desertion of their prince would be noised throughout the world; that, through mere regard to him, they had exposed their houses and property to plunderers, and, although unprovided, had taken a voluntary flight; food was matter of difficulty to all; many had not even clothing; he commended their fidelity indeed, but still could not insure their safety; the country was now so completely subdued, the coast so narrowly watched, that there was no escape unattended with danger; that they should, therefore, confer together what was to be done; were they to remain, greater peril was to be apprehended from their countrymen than from their enemies; for, perhaps, they might purchase the favour of their new master by joining to distress them; and certainly to be killed by an enemy was to be ascribed to chance—to be betrayed by a fellow-citizen was to be attributed to want of exertion; were they to fly to distant nations, it would be with the loss of honour; if to those who knew them, the dread would be, lest their dispositions should take a tinge from their reverse of fortune, for many great and illustrious men had been killed on similar occasions; but, however, he must make the experiment, and ascertain the inclinations of Richard duke of Normandy, who, if he should kindly receive his sister and nephews, might probably not unwillingly afford him his protection. "His favour shown to my wife and children," continued he, "will be the pledge of my own security. Should he oppose me, I am confident, nay fully confident, I shall not want spirit to die here with honour, in preference to living there with ignominy. Wherefore this very month of August, while milder gales are smoothing the ocean, let Emma make a voyage to her brother, taking our children, our common pledges, to be deposited with him. Let their companions be the bishop of Durham¹ and the abbot of Peterborough; I myself will remain here till Christmas; and should they send back a favourable answer, I will follow directly."

§ 178. On the breaking up of the conference all obeyed; they set sail for Normandy, while he remained anxiously expecting a favourable report. Shortly after he learned from abroad that Richard had received his sister with great affection, and that he invited the king also to condescend to become his inmate. Ethelred, therefore, going into Normandy, in the month of January,² felt his distresses soothed by the attentions of his host. This Richard was son of Richard the First,³ and equalled his father in good fortune and good qualities, though he certainly surpassed him in piety. He completed the monastery of Fescamp,⁴ which his father had begun. He was more intent on prayer and temperance than you would require in any monk or hermit. He was humble to excess, in order that he might subdue by his patience the petulance of those who attacked him. Moreover, it is reported that at night, secretly escaping the observation of his servants, he was accustomed to go unattended to the matins of the monks, and to continue in prayer till daylight. Intent on this practice, one night⁵ in particular, at Fescamp, he was earlier than customary, and finding the door shut he forced it open with unusual violence, and disturbed the sleep of the sacrist. He, astonished at the noise of any person knocking in the dead of night, got up, that he might see the author of so bold a deed; and finding only a countryman in appearance, clothed in rustic garb, he could not refrain from laying hands on him; so that, moved with vehement indignation, he caught hold of his hair, and gave this illustrious man a number of severe blows, which he bore with incredible patience, nor uttered a syllable. The next day Richard laid his complaint before the chapter,¹ and, with counterfeited anger summoned the monk to meet him at the town of Argens, threatening that he would take such vengeance for the injury as all France should talk of. On the day appointed, while the monk stood by almost dead with fear, he detailed the matter to the nobility, largely exaggerating the enormity of the transaction, and keeping the culprit in suspense, by crafty objections to what he urged in mitigation. Finally, after he had been sentenced by the nobility, he kindly pardoned him; and to make his forgiveness more acceptable, he annexed all that town with its appurtenances, reported to be abundant in the best wine, to the office of this sacrist, saying that he was an admirable monk, who properly observing his appointed charge, broke not silence, though roused with anger.² Dying after having held the duchy for twenty-eight years,³ he ordered his body to be buried at the door of the church,⁴ where it might be subjected to the feet of such as passed by, and to the drippings of the lofty eaves: but in our time, however, William,⁵ third abbot of that place, regarding this as disgraceful, removed the long-continued reproach, and taking up the body, placed it before the high altar. He had a brother, Robert,⁶ whom he made archbishop of Rouen, though by this he not a little tarnished his reputation; for he, cruelly abusing this honour, at first committed many crimes, many atrocious acts, but growing in years, he certainly wiped off some of them by his very liberal almsgiving. After Richard, his son of the same name obtained the principality, but lived scarcely a year.⁷ A vague opinion,⁸ indeed, has prevailed, that, by the connivance of his brother Robert,⁹ whom Richard the Second begat on Judith, daughter of Conan, earl of Brittany, a certain woman skilled in poisons removed the young man. Bewailing his privy to this transaction, he departed for Jerusalem, after the seventh year of his earldom; venturing on an undertaking very meritorious at that time, by commencing, with few followers, a journey, exposed to incursions of barbarians, and strange, by reason of the customs of the Saracens. He persevered, nevertheless, nor did he stop, but safely completed the whole distance; and purchasing admission at a high price, with bare feet and tearful eyes he worshipped at that glory of the Christians, I mean the sepulchre of our Lord. Conciliating the favour of God, as we believe, by this labour, on his return homewards he ended his days at Nice,¹ a city of Bithynia, cut off, as it is said, by poison, administered by his servant Ralph, surnamed Mowin, who had wrought himself up to the commission of this crime from a hope of the dukedom: but on his return to Normandy, the matter becoming known to all, he was detested as a monster, and retired to perpetual exile. To Robert succeeded William his son, then a child,² of whom, as I shall have to speak hereafter, I shall now return to my narrative.

§ 179. In the meantime Suane, as I have before related,³ oppressed England with rapine and with slaughter: the inhabitants were first plundered of their property, and then proscribed. In every city it was matter of doubt what should be done: if revolt were determined on, they had none to take the lead; if submission were made choice of, then a kind ruler was wanting. Thus their public and private property, together with their hostages, was carried to the fleet; as he was not a lawful sovereign, but a most cruel tyrant. The kindness of God, however, did not long permit England to fluctuate in such keen distress, for the invader died⁴ shortly after, on the Purification of St. Mary, though it is uncertain by what death. It is reported, that while devastating the possessions⁵ of St. Edmund, that martyr appeared to him in a vision, and gently addressed him on the misery of his people; that when Suane replied insolently, he struck him on the head; and that in consequence of the blow he died, as has been said, immediately after. The Danes then elect Cnut, the son of Suane, king: the English, on the other hand, declaring that their natural sovereign was dearer to them, if he could conduct himself more like a king than he had hitherto done, send for king Edred out of Normandy. He despatched Edward his son, first, to sound the fidelity of the higher orders and the inclination of the people, on the spot; who, when he saw the wishes of all tending to the favourable side, went back in full confidence for his father. The king returned,⁶ and being flattered by the joyful plaudits of the English, that he might appear to have shaken off his constitutional indolence, he hastened to collect an army against Cnut, who was at that time in Lindsey, where his father had left him with the ships and hostages, and was levying fresh troops and horses, in order that, mustering a sufficient force, he might make a vigorous attack upon his enemies before they were prepared for him, vowing most severe vengeance, as he used to say, on the deserters. But, circumvented by a contrivance similar to his own, he retreated. Escaping at that time with much difficulty, and putting to sea with his remaining forces, he coasted the British ocean from east to south, and landed at Sandwich. Here, setting all divine and human laws at defiance, he despoiled his hostages, who were young men of great nobility and elegance, of their ears and noses, and some he even castrated : and so, tyrannizing over the innocent, and boasting of the feat, he returned to his own country.¹

In the same year the sea-flood, which the Greeks call Euripus, and we Ledo,² rose to so wonderful a height,³ that none like it was recollected in the memory of man, and overflowed the villages, and destroyed their inhabitants, for many miles.

The year following, a grand council of Danes and English was assembled at Oxford,⁴ where the king commanded two of the noblest Danes, Sigeferd and Morcard,⁵ accused of treachery to him by the impeachment of the traitor Edric, to be put to death. He had lured them, when deceived by his soothing expressions, into a chamber, and murdered them, when drunk to excess, by his attendants prepared for the purpose. The cause of their murder was said to be, his unjustifiable desire for their property. Their dependents, attempting to revenge the death of their lords by arms, were defeated, and driven into the tower of St. Frideswide's church, where, as they could not be dislodged, they were consumed by fire : however, shortly after, the foul stain was wiped out by the king's penitence, and the chancel was repaired. I have read the history of this transaction, which is repositied in the archives of that church. The wife of Sigeferd, a woman remarkable for her rank and beauty, was carried prisoner to Malmesbury; on which account Edmund, the king's son, dissembling his intention, took a journey into those parts, and becoming enamoured of her as soon as he saw her, he made her his wife ; cautiously keeping their union secret from his father, who was as much an object of contempt to his family as to strangers. This Edmund was not born of Emma, but of some other person,⁶ whom fame has lost in obscurity. In other respects he was unexceptionable ; a young man of noble disposition, of great strength both of mind and person ; and, on this account, by the English called "Ireneside : " he would have shrouded the indolence of his father, and the meanness of his mother, by his own conspicuous virtue, could the fates have spared him. Soon after, at the instigation of his wife, he asked of his father the possessions of Sigeferd, which were of large extent among the Northumbrians, but he could not obtain them ; by his own exertions, however, he procured them at last, the inhabitants of that province willingly submitting to his power.

§ 180. The same summer Cnut having settled his affairs in Denmark, and entered into alliance with the neighbouring kings, came into England,¹ determined to conquer or perish in the attempt. Proceeding from Sandwich into Kent, and thence into West Saxony, he laid everything waste with fire and slaughter, while the king was lying sick at Cosham.² Edmund, indeed, attempted to oppose him, but being thwarted by Edric, he placed his forces in a secure situation. Edric, however, thinking it unnecessary longer to dissemble, but that he might now openly throw off the mask, deserted to Cnut with forty ships; and all West Saxony likewise followed his example, both delivering hostages, and giving up their arms. Yet the Mercians repeatedly assembled, and stood forward to resist; and would but the king come, and command whither they were to march, and bring with him the leading men of London, they were ready to shed their blood for their country. But he, accustomed to commit his safety to fortifications, and not to attack the enemy, remained in London, never venturing out, for fear, as he said, of traitors. In the meantime Cnut was gaining towns and villages over to his party; was never unemployed; held consultations by night, and fought by day. Edmund, after long deliberation, esteeming it best in such an emergency to recover, if possible, the revolted cities by arms, brought over Uhtred, an earl on the other side of the Humber, to the same sentiments: for they imagined that such cities as were yet doubtful which side to take, would determine at once, were they to inflict signal vengeance on those who had revolted. But Cnut, possessed of equal penetration, circumvented them by a similar contrivance; for, giving over the West Saxons and that part of Mercia which he had subjugated to the custody of his generals, he himself proceeded against the Northumbrians; and by depopulating the country, compelled Uhtred to retire for the defence of his own possessions; and although he surrendered himself, yet with inhuman levity he ordered him to be put to death. His earldom was given to Iric, whom Cnut afterwards expelled from England, when pretending to equal power with himself. Thus all being subdued, he ceased not from pursuing Edmund, who was retreating by intervals, till he heard that he was at London with his father. Cnut then remained quiet till after Easter, that he might attack the city with all his forces. But the death of Ethelred³ preceded the attempt; for in the beginning of Lent, he, on St. Gregory's day,⁴ breathed out a life destined only to labours and misery: he lies buried at St. Paul's in London. The citizens immediately proclaimed Edmund king, who mustering an army, routed the Danes at Penn⁵ and Gillingham, about Rogation-day. After the festival of St. John [24th June], engaging them again at Seorstan,⁶ he retired from a drawn battle. His English had begun to give way, at the instance of Edric, who being on the adversaries' side, and holding in his hand a sword stained with the blood of a rustic whom he had dexterously slain, exclaimed, "Fly, wretches! fly! behold, your king was killed by this sword!" The English would have fled immediately had not the king, apprised of this circumstance, proceeded to an eminence, and taking off his helmet, shown his face to his comrades. Then brandishing a dart with all his force, he launched it at Edric; but being seen and avoided, it missed him, and struck a soldier standing near; and so great was its violence that it even transfixed a second. Night put a stop to the battle, the hostile armies retreating as if by mutual consent, though the English had well nigh obtained the victory. After this the sentiments of the West Saxons changed, and they acknowledged their lawful sovereign. Edmund proceeded to London, that he might liberate those deserving citizens whom a party of the enemy had blocked up immediately after his departure; moreover they had surrounded the whole city, on the parts not washed by the river Thames, with a trench;¹ and many had lost their lives in their mutual conflicts. Hearing of the king's approach, they precipitately took to flight; while he pursuing directly, and passing the ford called Brentford, routed them with great slaughter. The remaining multitude which were with Cnut, while Edmund was relaxing a little, and getting his affairs in order, again laid siege to London both on the land and river side; but being nobly repulsed by the citizens, they wreaked their anger on adjacent Mercia, laying waste the towns and villages with plunder, fire, and slaughter. The richest of the spoil was conveyed to their ships assembled in the river Medway, which flowing by the city of Rochester, washes its fair walls with a strong and rapid current. They were attacked and driven hence also by the king in person; who suddenly seizing the ford, which I have before mentioned at Brentford, dispersed them with signal loss. While Edmund was preparing to pursue and utterly destroy the last remains of these plunderers, he was prevented by the crafty and abandoned Edric, who had again insinuated himself into his good graces; for he had come over to Edmund, at the instigation of Cnut, that he might betray his designs. Had the king only persevered, this would have been the last day for the Danes; but being misled (as I have stated) by the insinuations of a traitor, who affirmed that the enemy would make no further attempt, he brought swift destruction upon himself and the whole of England. Being allowed by this means to escape, they again assembled; they attacked the East Angles, and at Assandun compelled the king himself, who came to their assistance, to retreat. Here, again, the person I am ashamed to mention so frequently, designedly gave the first example of flight. A small number, who, mindful of their former fame and encouraging each other, had formed a compact body, were cut off to a man. Here Cnut gained the kingdom; here the glory of England fell; here the whole flower of the country withered, amongst whom was Ulkill, earl of East Anglia, who had gained immortal honour in the time of Suane, when, first attacking the pirates, he showed that they might be overcome: here fell, too, the chief men of the day, both bishops and abbots.¹ Edmund flying hence almost alone, came to Gloucester, in order that there, reassembling his forces, he might attack the enemy, indolent, as he supposed, after their recent victory. Nor was Cnut wanting in courage to pursue the fugitive. When everything was ready for battle, Edmund demanded a single combat, that two individuals might not, for the lust of dominion, be stained with the blood of so many subjects, when they might try their fortune without the destruction of their faithful adherents; and observing that it must redound greatly to the credit of either, to have obtained so vast a dominion at his own personal peril. On the proposal being made, Cnut refused it altogether; affirming that his courage was surpassing, but that he was apprehensive of trusting his diminutive person against so bulky an antagonist; but, however, as both had equal pretensions to the kingdom, since the fathers of both had possessed it, it was consistent with prudence that they should lay aside their animosity and divide England.² This proposition was adopted by each army, and confirmed with much applause, both for its equity and its beneficent regard to the repose of persons who were worn out with continual suffering. In consequence, Edmund, overcome by the general clamour, yielded to peace, entered into treaty with Cnut, retained West Saxony for himself, and conceded Mercia to the other. Dying soon after, on the festival of St. Andrew, though by what mischance is not known,³ he was buried at Glastonbury near his grandfather Eadgar. Fame asperses Eadric, as having, through regard for Cnut, compassed his death by means of his servants; reporting that there were two attendants on the king to whom he had committed the entire care of his person, and that Eadric, seducing them by promises, at length made them his accomplices, though at first they were struck with horror at the enormity of the crime; and that, at his suggestion, they drove an iron hook into his posteriors, as he was sitting down for a necessary purpose. Edwin, his brother on the mother's side,⁴

² According to the Saxon Chronicle, the meeting between Cnut and Edmund took place at Olaneg, near Deerhurst, an island on the river Severn. Henry Huntingdon says they actually engaged, and that Cnut finding himself likely to be defeated, proposed the division. (H. Hunt. l. 6.)

⁴ Edwi the brother of Eadmund Ironside, and Edwi called Ceorla Cyning, (king of the Clowns,) were outlawed A. D. 1017. The former was afterwards slain by order of Cnut. See Sax. Chron. Flor. Wigorn.

a youth of amiable disposition, was driven from England by Edric, at the command of Cnut, and "suffering extremely for a considerable time both by sea and land," his body, as is often the case, became affected by the anxiety of his mind, and he died in England, where he lay concealed after a clandestine return, and lies buried at Tavistock. His sons,¹ Edwy² and Edward,³ were sent to the king of Sweden to be put to death; but being preserved by his pity, they went to the king of Hungary, where, after being kindly treated for a time, the elder died; and the younger married Agatha, the sister of the queen. His brothers by Emma,⁴ namely, Elfred and Edward, lay securely concealed in Normandy for the whole time that Cnut lived. I find that their uncle Richard took no steps to restore them to their country; on the contrary, he married his sister Emma to the enemy and invader; and it may be difficult to say, whether to the greater ignominy of him who bestowed her, or of the woman who consented to share the nuptial couch of that man who had so cruelly molested her husband, and had driven her children into exile. Robert, however, whom we before mentioned as having gone to Jerusalem,⁵ assembling a fleet and embarking soldiers, made ready an expedition, boasting that he would set the crown on the heads of his grand-nephews; and doubtless he would have made good his assertion, had not, as we have heard from our ancestors, an adverse wind constantly opposed him: but assuredly this was by the hidden counsel of God, in whose disposal are the powers of all kingdoms. The remains of the vessels, decayed through length of time, were still to be seen at Rouen in our days.

§ 181. Cnut began to reign in the year of our Lord one thousand and seventeen, and governed during twenty years. Though he obtained the sovereignty unjustly, yet he conducted himself with great affability and firmness. At his entrance on the government, dividing the kingdom into four parts, he himself took the West Saxons, Edric the Mercians, Turkill the East Angles, Iric the Northumbrians. His first care was to punish the murderers of Edmund, who had, under expectation of great recompence, acknowledged of their own accord the whole fact. He concealed them for a time, and then brought them forward in a large assembly of the people, where they confessed the mode of their attack upon him, and were immediately ordered to execution. The same year Edric, whom I cannot sufficiently revile, being by the king's command entrapped in the same snare which he had so frequently laid for others, breathed out his abominable spirit to hell. For, some quarrel arising, while they were angrily discoursing, Edric relying on the credit of his services,⁶ and amicably, as it were, reproaching the king, said, "I first deserted Edmund for your sake, and afterwards even despatched him in consequence of my engagements to you :” at which expression Cnut’s face turned red with indignation ; and instantly pronouncing sentence, “ And you, therefore,” said he, “ shall die, and justly, since you are guilty of treason both to God and me, by having killed your own sovereign and my sworn brother ; thy blood be upon thy head, because thy mouth hath spoken against thee, in that thou hast lifted thy hand against the Lord’s anointed :” and immediately, that no tumult might be excited, the traitor was strangled in the chamber where they sate, and thrown out of the window into the river Thames,¹ thus meeting the just reward of his perfidy. In process of time, as opportunities occurred, Turkill² and Eric were driven out of the kingdom, and sought their native land. The first, who had been the instigator of the murder of the blessed Elfeg, was killed by the chiefs the moment he touched the Danish shore.³ When all England by this means became subject to Cnut alone, he began to conciliate the English with unceasing diligence ; allowing them equal rights with the Danes, in their assemblies, councils, and armies ; on which account, as I have before observed,⁴ he sent for the wife of the late king out of Normandy, so that while they were paying obedience to their accustomed sovereign, they should the less repine at the dominion of the Danes. Another design which he had in view by this, was to acquire favour with Richard, who would think little of his nephews so long as he supposed he might have others by Cnut. He repaired the monasteries throughout England, which had been partly injured and partly destroyed by the military incursions of himself and of his father : he built churches in all the places where he had fought, and more particularly at Ashdown,⁵ and appointed ministers to them, who through succeeding ages might pray to God for the souls of the persons there slain. At the consecration of this church he himself was present, and the English and Danish nobility made their offerings : it is now, according to report, an ordinary church, under the care of a parish priest. Over the body of the most holy Edmund, whom the Danes of former times had killed, he built a church with princely magnificence,⁶ appointed to it an abbot and monks ; and conferred on it many large estates. The greatness of his donation, yet entire, stands proudly eminent at the present day ; for that place surpasses almost all the monasteries of England. He took up with his own hands the body of the blessed Elfeg, which had been buried at St. Paul’s in London, and sending it to Canterbury, honoured it with due regard.¹ Thus anxious to atone for the offences of himself and of his predecessors, perhaps he wiped away the foul stain of his former crimes in the sight of God—certainly he did so with man. At Winchester especially he displayed the magnificence of his liberality: here he gave so largely that the quantity of precious metals astonished the minds of strangers, and the glittering of jewels dazzled the eyes of the beholders. This was at Emma's suggestion,² who, with pious prodigality, exhausted his treasures in works of this kind, while he was meditating fierce attacks on foreign lands; for his valour, incapable of rest, and not contented with Denmark, which he held paternally, and England, which he possessed by right of conquest, transferred its rage against the Swedes.³ These people are contiguous to the Danes, and had excited the displeasure of Cnut by their ceaseless hostility. At first he fell into an ambush, and lost many of his people, but afterwards recruiting his strength, he routed his opponents, and brought the kings of that nation, Ulf and Eglaf, to terms of peace. The English, at the instance of earl Godwin, behaved nobly in this conflict: he exhorted them not to forget their ancient fame, but clearly to display their valour to their new lord; telling them that it must be imputed to fortune that they had formerly been conquered by him, but it would be ascribed to their courage, if they overcame those who had overcome him. In consequence, the English exerted all their strength, and gaining the victory, obtained an earldom for their commander, and honour for themselves. Thence, on his return home, he entirely subdued the kingdom of Norway, putting Olave their king to flight;⁴ who, the year following, returning with a small party into his kingdom, to try the inclinations of the inhabitants, found them faithless, and was slain with his adherents.

§ 182. In the fifteenth year of his reign, Cnut⁵ went to Rome, and after remaining there some time, and atoning for his crimes, by giving alms to the several churches, he sailed back to England.⁶ Soon after, with little difficulty, he subdued Scotland, then in a state of rebellion, and Malcolm her king, by leading an army thither. I trust it will not appear useless, if, to show his reformed life and princely magnificence, I subjoin the epistle⁷ which he transmitted to the English on his departure from Rome, by the hands of Living,⁸ abbot of Tavistock, and afterwards bishop of Crediton.

§ 183. " Cnut, king of all England, Denmark, Norway,¹ and part of the Swedes, to Alnoth,² metropolitan, and Alfric³ [archbishop] of York, and to all bishops and nobles, and to the whole nation of the English, high and low, sends greeting :

I notify to you, that I have lately been to Rome, to pray for the forgiveness of my sins, for the safety of my dominions, and of the people under my government. I had long since vowed such a journey to God, but, hitherto hindered by the affairs of my kingdom, and other causes preventing, I was unable to accomplish it sooner. I now return thanks most humbly to my Almighty God, for suffering me, in my lifetime, to approach the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and every shrine within and without the city of Rome, which I could discover, and there, in person, to worship and adore according to my desire. I have been the more diligent in the performance of this, because I have learnt from the wise, that St. Peter the apostle has received from God the great power of binding and loosing, and that he carries the key of the kingdom of heaven ; and, consequently, I have judged it matter of special importance to seek his influence with God. Be it known to you, that at the solemnity of Easter, a great assembly of nobles was present with pope John⁴ and the emperor Conrad,⁵ that is to say, all the princes of the nations from mount Garganus⁶ to the neighbouring sea. All these received me with honour, and presented me with magnificent gifts. But more especially was I honoured by the emperor with various gifts and offerings, in gold and silver vessels, and palls, and very costly garments. Moreover, I spoke with the emperor himself, and our lord the pope and the nobles who were there, concerning the wants of all my people, English as well as Danes ; observing that there ought to be granted to them more equitable regulations, and greater security on their passage to Rome ; that they should not be impeded by so many barriers⁷ on the road, nor harassed with unjust exactions. The emperor assented to my request, as did Rodulf⁸ the king, who has the chief control over those barriers ; and all the

princes confirmed by an edict, that my subjects—traders as well as those who went on a religious account—should peaceably go and return from Rome, without any forced contribution to be paid to these warders of barriers, or tax-gatherers. Again I complained before the pope, and expressed my high displeasure, that my archbishops were oppressed by the immense sum of money which is demanded from them when they went, according to custom, to the holy residence to receive the pall: and it was determined that it should be so no longer. Moreover, all things which I requested for the advantage of my kingdom, from our lord the pope, and the emperor, and king Rodulf, and the other princes, through whose territories our road to Rome is situated, they have freely granted and confirmed by oath, under the attestation of four archbishops, twenty bishops, and an innumerable multitude of dukes and nobles who were present. Wherefore I give most hearty thanks to God Almighty, for having successfully completed all that I had wished, in the manner I had designed, and fully satisfied my intentions. Be it known, then, that since I have vowed to God himself henceforward to reform my life in all things, and justly and piously to govern the kingdoms and the people subject to me, and to maintain equal justice in all things; and have determined, through God's assistance, to rectify anything hitherto unjustly done, either through the intemperance of my youth, or through negligence; therefore I adjure and command my counsellors, to whom I have entrusted the counsels of the kingdom, that they by no means, either through fear of myself, or favour to any powerful person, suffer henceforth any injustice, or give cause for the growth of such, in all my kingdom. Moreover, I command all sheriffs and governors throughout my whole kingdom, as they regard my affection or their own safety, not to commit injustice towards any man, be he rich or poor, but to allow all, noble and ignoble, alike to enjoy impartial law, from which they are never to deviate, either on account of royal favour, or the person of any powerful man, or for the sake of amassing money for myself: for I have no need to accumulate money by unjust exaction. Be it known to you, therefore, that returning by the same way that I went, I am now going to Denmark, through the advice of all the Danes, to make peace and firm treaty with those nations, who were desirous, had it been possible for them, to deprive me both of life and of sovereignty: this, however, they were not able to perform, since God, who by his kindness preserves me in my kingdom and in my honour, and destroys the power of all my adversaries, has brought their strength to nought. Moreover, when I have established peace with the surrounding nations, and put all our sovereignty here in the east in tranquil order, so that there shall be no fear of war or enmity on any side, I intend coming to England, as early in the summer as I shall be able to get my fleet prepared. I have sent this epistle before me, in order that my people might rejoice at my prosperity; because, as yourselves know, I have never spared, nor will I spare, either myself or my pains, for the needful service of my whole people. I now, therefore, adjure all my bishops and the governors of my kingdom, by the fidelity which you owe to God and to me, that you take care that before I come to England, all dues owing by ancient custom be discharged: that is to say, plough-alms,¹ the tenth of animals² born in the current year, and the pence owing to Rome for St. Peter, whether from cities or villages; and in the middle of August, the tenth of the produce of the earth; and on the festival of St. Martin, the first-fruits of seeds, to the church of the parish where each one resides, which is called in English "chirchseet."³ If these and such like things be not paid ere I come to England, all who shall have offended will incur the penalty of a royal mulct, to be exacted without remission according to law."

Nor was the effect wanting to this profession; for he commanded all the laws which had been enacted by ancient kings, and chiefly by his predecessor Ethelred, to be observed for ever, under the penalty of a royal mulct; in the observance of which the custom, even at the present day, in the time of good kings, is to swear by the name of king Edward, not that the king enacted, but that he observed them.⁴

§ 184. At that time there were in England very great and learned men, the principal of whom was Ethelnoth,⁵ archbishop after Living.⁶ Appointed primate from being dean, he performed many works truly worthy of record; encouraging even the king himself in his good actions by the authority of his sanctity, and restraining him in his excesses; he first exalted the archiepiscopal cathedral by the presence of the body of St. Elfeg, and afterwards personally, at Rome, restored it to its pristine dignity.⁷ Returning home, he transmitted to Coventry the arm of St. Augustine,⁸ the teacher, which he had purchased at Pavia, for a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold.⁹ Moreover, Cnut took a journey to the church of Glastonbury, that he might visit the remains of his brother Edmund, as he used to call him; and having finished his prayers, he placed over his tomb a pall, interwoven, as it appeared, with parti-coloured figures of peacocks. Near the king stood the before-named Ethelnoth, who was the seventh monk of Glastonbury who had become archbishop of Canterbury: first, Brithwald;¹⁰

second, Adthelm,¹ formerly bishop of Wells; third, his nephew Dunstan;² fourth, Ethelgar,³ first abbot of the Newminster at Winchester, and then bishop of Chichester; fifth, Siric,⁴ who when made archbishop gave to this his nursing mother seven palls, with which, upon his anniversary, the whole ancient church is ornamented; sixth, Elfeg,⁵ who from prior of Glastonbury was first made abbot of Bath, then bishop of Winchester; seventh, Ethelnoth,⁶ who upon showing to the king the immunities of his predecessors, asked, and asking obtained, that they should be confirmed by the king's own hand to the following effect:—

§ 185. "The Lord reigning for evermore, who disposes and governs all things by his unspeakable power, wonderfully determining the changes of times and of men, and justly bringing them to an uncertain end, according to his pleasure; and who from the secret mysteries of nature mercifully teaches us, how kingdoms which are lasting, instead of those which are fleeting and transitory, are to be obtained by the assistance of God; wherefore, I Cnut, king of England, and governor and ruler of the adjacent nations, by the counsel and decree of our archbishop Ethelnoth, and of all the priests of God, and by the advice of our nobility, do, for the love of heaven, and the pardon of my sins, and the remission of the transgressions of my brother,⁸ king Edmund, grant to the church of the holy mother of God, the ever-Virgin Mary, at Glastonbury, its rights and customs throughout my kingdom, and all forfeitures throughout its possessions, and that its lands shall be free from all claim and vexation as my own are possessed by myself. Moreover, I inhibit more especially, by the authority of the Almighty, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and the curse of the ever-Virgin, and so command it to be observed by the judges and primates of my kingdom, as they value their own safety, every person, be they of whatever order or dignity they may, from entering on any account that island; but that all causes, ecclesiastical as well as secular, shall await the sole judgment of the abbot and convent, in like manner as my predecessors have ratified and confirmed by charters; that is to say, Chentwine, Ine, Cuthred, Elfred, Edward,⁹ Athelstan, the most glorious Edmund, and the incomparable Edgar. And should any one hereafter endeavour, on any occasion, to break in upon or make void the enactment of this grant, let him be driven from the communion of the righteous by the winnowing-fan of the last judgment; but should any person endeavour diligently, with kind intention, to perform these things, to approve, and to defend them, may God increase his portion in the land of the living, through the intercession of the most holy mother of God, and the rest of the saints. The grant of this immunity was written and published in the wooden church, in the presence of king Cnut, in the year of our Lord one thousand and thirty-two, of the indiction the second."¹

§ 186. By the advice of the said archbishop, also, the king sending money to foreign churches, very much enriched Chartres, where at that time flourished bishop Fulbert,² most renowned for sanctity and learning; who, among other proofs of his diligence, very magnificently completed the church of our lady St. Mary, the foundations of which he laid, and which moreover, doing every thing he could for its honour, he rendered celebrated by many musical modulations. The man who has heard his chants, breathing only celestial vows, is best able to conceive the love he manifested in honour of the Virgin. Among his other works, a volume of epistles is extant, in one of which³ he thanks that most magnificent king, Cnut, for pouring out the bowels of his generosity in donations to the church of Chartres.

§ 187. In the fifteenth year of Cnut's reign, Robert king of France, of whom we have before briefly spoken,⁴ departed this life; a man so much given to alms, that when, on festival days, he was either dressing or putting off the royal robes, if he had nothing else at hand, he would give even these to the poor, did not his attendants purposely drive away the needy who were importuning him. He had two sons, Odo and Henry; the elder, Odo,⁵ was dull; the other crafty and impetuous. The parents were divided in their affections for their children. The father loved the first-born, often saying that he should succeed him; the mother regarded the younger, to whom the sovereignty was justly due, if not for his age, yet certainly for his ability. It happened, as women are persevering in their designs, that she did not cease until, by means of presents and large promises, she had gained over to her side all the chief nobility who are subject to the power of France. In consequence, Henry, chiefly through the assistance of Robert the Norman, was crowned ere his father had well breathed his last. Mindful of this kindness, when, as I before related,⁶ Robert went to Jerusalem,

Henry most strenuously espoused the cause of William his son, then a youth, against those who attempted to throw off his yoke. In the meantime Cnut finishing his earthly career, died at Shaftesbury, and was buried at Winchester.¹

Of Harold, the Son of Cnut.

§ 188. In the year of our Lord's incarnation one thousand and thirty-six,² Harold, whom fame³ reported to be the son of Cnut, by the daughter of earl Elfelme, succeeded, and reigned four years and as many months. He was elected by the Danes and the citizens of London, who, from long intercourse with these barbarians, had almost entirely adopted their customs. The English resisted for a long time, rather wishing to have for their king one of the sons of Ethelred, who were then in Normandy, or else Hardecnut, the son of Cnut by Emma, at that time in Denmark. The greatest champion for justice, at this juncture, was earl Godwin, who professing himself the defender of the fatherless, and having queen Emma and the royal treasures in his custody, for some time restrained his opponents by the power of his name; but at last, overcome by numbers and by violence, he was obliged to yield. Harold, secure in his sovereignty, drove his mother-in-law into exile.⁴ Not thinking she would be safe in Normandy; (where, her brother and nephews being dead, hostility was evinced against a deserted orphan,) she passed over into Flanders to earl Baldwin,⁵ a man of tried integrity; who afterwards, (when king Henry died,⁶ leaving a young son, Philip,⁷) for some years nobly governed the kingdom of France, and faithfully restored it to him when he came of age, for he had married his aunt. Emma passed three years securely under the protection of this man; at the expiration of which time, Harold dying at Oxford, in the month⁸ of April, was buried at Westminster. The Danes and English then uniting in one common sentiment as to the expediency of sending for Hardecnut, he came by way of Normandy into England in the month of August;⁹ for Ethelred's sons were held in contempt by nearly all, more from the

³ "Some men said of Harold, that he was the son of Cnut and Elfgife the daughter of Elfelme, ealdorman; but it was thought very incredible by many men." (Sax. Chron.) Florence states that Elgife, not being able to bear the king a son, passed upon him the child of a cobbler.

recollection of their father's indolence than the power of the Danes. Hardecnut reigning two years except ten days, lost his life¹ amid his cups at Lambeth, nigh London, and was buried near his father at Winchester. He was a young man who evinced great affection towards his brother and sister; for his brother, Edward, wearied with continual wandering, revisiting his native land in the hope of fraternal kindness, was received by him (they say) with open arms, and entertained most affectionately. Rash, however, in other respects, at the instigation of Alfric, bishop of York, and of others whom I am loth to name, he ordered the dead body of Harold to be dug up, the head to be cut off, and thrown into the Thames, a pitiable spectacle to men! but being dragged up in a fisherman's net, it was buried in the cemetery of the Danes at London.² He imposed a rigid and intolerable tribute upon England, in order that he might pay, according to his promise, twenty³ marks to the soldiers of each of his vessels. While this was harshly levied throughout the kingdom, two of the collectors, discharging their office rather too rigorously, were killed by the citizens of Worcester; upon which, burning and depopulating the city by means of his commanders, and plundering the property of the citizens, he sullied his fame and diminished the love of his subjects. But here I will not pass over in silence what tattlers report of Elfred the firstborn of Ethelred. Doubtful what to do between Harold's⁴ death and the arrival of Hardecnut, he came into the kingdom, and was deprived of his eyes by the treachery of his countrymen, and chiefly of Godwin, at Gillingeham; from thence being sent to the monastery of Ely, he supported, for a little time, a wretched existence upon homely food; nine-tenths of his companions being beheaded, for by lot every tenth man was saved. I have mentioned these circumstances because such is the report; but as the Chronicles⁵ are silent, I do not assert them for fact. For this reason, Hardecnut, enraged against Living, bishop of Credition, whom public opinion pointed at as author of the transaction, expelled him from his see; but, soothed with a bribe, he restored him within the year. Looking angrily too upon Godwin, he obliged him to clear himself by oath. He, to recover his favour entirely, added to his plighted oath a present of the most rich and beautiful kind. It was a ship beaked with gold, having eighty soldiers on board, who had two bracelets on either arm, each weighing sixteen ounces of gold; on their heads were gilt helmets; on their left shoulder they carried a Danish axe, with an iron spear in their right hand; and, not to enumerate every thing, they were equipped with such arms, as that splendour vying with terror, might conceal the steel beneath the gold. But farther, as I had begun to relate, his sister Gunhilda, the daughter of Cnut by Emma, a young woman of exquisite beauty, who was sought but not obtained by many lovers in her father's time, was by Hardecnut given in marriage to Henry,¹ emperor of the Germans. The splendour of the nuptial pageant was very striking, and is even in our times frequently sung in ballads about the streets; where while this renowned lady was being conducted to the ship, all the nobility of England were crowding around, and contributing to her charges whatever was contained in the general purse or royal treasury. Proceeding in this manner to her husband, she cherished for a long time the conjugal tie; at length being accused of adultery, she opposed in single combat to her accuser, who was a man of gigantic size,² a young lad who took care of her starling,³ whom she had brought from England, while her other attendants held back in cowardly apprehension. When, therefore, they engaged, the impeacher, through the miraculous interposition of God, was defeated by being hamstrung. Gunhilda, exulting at her unexpected success, renounced the marriage contract with her husband; nor could she be induced either by threats or by endearments again to share his bed, but taking the veil of a nun, she calmly grew old in the service of God.

⁵ The earlier editions of the printed Saxon Chronicle have no mention of this transaction, but there are two manuscripts which relate it. The story appears true in the main, but it is told with so much variety of time, place, &c., that it is difficult to ascertain its real circumstances.

Concerning the Emperor Henry.

§ 189. This emperor possessed many and great virtues; and nearly surpassed in military skill all his predecessors; so much so that he subdued the Vindelici and the Leutici,⁴ and the other nations bordering on the Suevi, who alone, even to the present day, crave after Pagan superstitions. For the Saracens and Turks worship God the Creator, looking upon Mahomet not as God, but as his prophet; but the Vindelici worship Fortune, and putting her idol in the most eminent situation, they place a horn in her right hand, filled with that beverage made of honey and water, which by a Greek term we call hydromel. St. Jerome proves, in his eighteenth book on Isaiah, that the Egyptians and almost all the eastern nations do the same. Wherefore, on the last day of November, sitting round in a circle, they taste it in common; and if they find the horn full, they applaud with loud clamours, because in the ensuing year, Plenty with her brimming horn will fulfil their wishes in every thing; but if it be otherwise, they lament. Henry made these nations in such wise tributary to him, that upon every solemnity on which he wore his crown, four of their kings were obliged to carry a cauldron in which flesh was boiled, upon their shoulders, to the kitchen, by means of bars passed through four rings.

Concerning the Emperor's Sister, and a certain Priest who was her Lover.

§ 190. Frequently, when disengaged from the turmoils of his empire, Henry gave himself up to good fellowship and merriment, and was replete with humour; which may be sufficiently proved by two instances. He was so extremely fond of his sister, who was a nun, that he never suffered her to be from his side, and her chamber was always next to his own. As he was on a certain time (in consequence of a winter remarkable for severe frost and snow) detained for a long while in the same place, a certain clerk¹ about the court became too familiar with the girl, and often passed the greatest part of the night in her chamber; and although he attempted to conceal his crime by numberless subterfuges, yet some one perceived it, (for it is difficult not to betray guilt either by look or action,) and the affair becoming notorious, the emperor was the only person who remained in ignorance, and who still believed his sister to be chaste. On one particular night, however, as they were enjoying their fond embraces, and continuing their pleasures longer than usual, the morning dawned upon them, and behold snow had completely covered the ground; and then the clerk fearing that he should be discovered by his track in the snow, persuaded his mistress to extricate him from his difficulty by carrying him on her back. She, regardless of modesty so that she might escape shame, took her paramour on her back, and carried him out of the palace. It happened at that moment that the emperor had risen for a necessary purpose, and looking through the window of his chamber, beheld the clerk mounted: he was stupified at the first sight, but observing still more narrowly, he became mute with shame and indignation. While he was hesitating whether he should pass over the crime unpunished, or openly reprehend the delinquents, there happened an opportunity for him to give a vacant bishopric to the clerk, which he did: but at the same time whispered in his ear, "Take the bishopric, but be careful you do not let women carry you any more." At the same time giving his sister the rule over a company of nuns, "Be an abbess," said he, "but carry clerks no longer." Both confused, and feeling themselves grievously stricken by so grave an injunction, desisted from a crime which they thought revealed by God.

Of the Clerk who would not read the Gospel for the Emperor.

§ 191. He had also a clergyman about his palace, who abused the depth of his learning and the melody of his voice by the vicious propensities of the flesh, by being extremely attached to a girl of bad character in the town; with whom having passed one festival night, he stood next morning before the emperor at mass, with countenance unabashed. The emperor concealing his knowledge of the transaction, commanded him to prepare himself to read the gospel, that he might be gratified with the melody of his voice; for he was a deacon. Conscious of his crime, he made use of a multitude of subterfuges, while the emperor, to try his constancy, still pressed him with messages. Refusing, however, to the very last, the emperor said, "Since you will not obey me in so easy a command, I banish you from the whole of my territories." The deacon yielding to the sentence, departed directly. Servants were sent to follow him, and in case he should persist in going, to bring him back after he had left the city. Gathering, therefore, immediately all his effects together, and packing them up, he had already gone a considerable distance, when he was brought back, not without extreme violence, and placed in Henry's presence. Pleasantly smiling, "You have done well," said he, "and I applaud your integrity for valuing the fear of God more than your country, and regarding the displeasure of Heaven more than my threats: accept, therefore, the first bishopric which shall be vacant in my empire; only renounce your dishonourable amour."

§ 192. As nothing, however, is lasting in human enjoyments, I shall not pass over in silence a certain dreadful portent which happened in his time. The monastery of Fulda, in Saxony, is celebrated for containing the body of St. Gall,¹ and is enriched with very ample territories. The abbot of this place furnishes the emperor with sixty thousand warriors against his enemies, and possesses from ancient times the privilege of sitting at his right hand on the most distinguished festivals. This Henry of whom we are speaking was celebrating Pentecost at Mentz. A little before mass, while the seats were being prepared in the church, a quarrel arose between the attendants of the abbot and those of the archbishop, which of their masters should sit next the sovereign; one party alleging the dignity of the prelate, the other ancient usage. When words made but little for peace, (as the Germans and Teutonians possess untractable spirits,) they came to blows. Some snatched up staves, others threw stones, while the rest unsheathed their swords: finally each used the weapon that his anger first supplied. Thus furiously contending in the church, the pavement soon streamed with blood: but the bishops hastening forward, peace was restored amid the remains of the contending parties; the church was cleansed, and mass performed with joyful sound. But now to the wonder; when the sequence was chanted, and the choir paused at that verse, "Thou hast made this day glorious," a voice in the air far resounded, "I have made this day contentious." All the others were motionless with horror, but the emperor the more diligently attended to his occupation, and perceiving the satisfaction of the enemy—"You," said he, "the inventor and also the instigator of all wickedness, you have made this day contentious and sorrowful to the proud; but we by the grace of God, who made it glorious, will make it gracious to the poor." And now, the sequence beginning afresh, he implored the grace of the Holy Spirit by solemn lamentation : and you might suppose that He had vouchsafed his presence, some singing, others weeping, and all beating their breasts. When mass was over, assembling the poor by means of his officers, he gave them the whole of the entertainment which had been prepared for himself and his courtiers ; the emperor placing the dishes before them, standing at a distance according to the custom of servants, and clearing away the fragments.

§ 193. In the time of his father Conrad, he had received a silver pipe, such as boys in sport spirt water with, from a certain clerk, covenanting to give him a bishopric, when he should become emperor. This, when he was of man's estate, on his application he readily gave to him. Soon after he was confined to his bed with severe sickness : his malady increasing, he lay for three days insensible and speechless, while the breath of life only palpitated in his breast ; nor was there any other sign of life than the perception of a small degree of breathing, on applying the hand to his nostrils. The bishops being present, enjoined a fast for three days, and entreated Heaven, with tears and vows, for the life of the king. Recovering by these remedies, as it is right to think, he sent for the bishop whom he had so improperly appointed, and deposed him by the judgment of a council ; confessing that throughout those three days, he saw malignant demons blowing fire upon him through a pipe—fire so furious that ours in comparison would be deemed a jest, and to have no heat ; that afterwards there came a young man half-scorched, bearing a golden cup of immense size, full of water ; and that being soothed by the sight of him, and bathed in the water, the flame was extinguished, and he recovered his health ; that this young man was St. Laurence, the roof of whose church he had restored when it had gone to decay ; and, among other presents, had honoured it with a golden chalice.

§ 194. Here many extraordinary things occur, which are reported of this man ; for instance, of a stag which took him on its back, when flying from his enemies, and carried him over an unfordable river ; and some others which I pass by, because I am unwilling to go beyond the reader's belief. He died when he had completed the eighteenth year of his empire,¹ and was buried at Spires, which he rebuilt and called by that name, on the site of the very ancient and ruined Nemetum. His epitaph is as follows :—

“ Cæsar, as was the world once great,
Lies here, confin'd in compass straight ;
Hence let each mortal learn his doom—
No glory can escape the tomb.
The flower of empire, once so gay,
Falls with its Cæsar to decay,
And all the odours which it gave Sink prematurely to the grave.

¹ Henry died at Bodfeld, on the confines of Saxony and Thuringia, in the seventeenth year of his reign, but in the fifteenth of his empire, on the 5th of October, A. D. 1056, and was interred at Spires.

The laws which sapient fathers made,
 A listless race had dared evade,
 But thou, reforming by the school
 Of Rome, gave back the ancient rule.
 Nations and regions, wide and far,
 Whom none could subjugate by war,
 Quell'd by thy sword's resistless strife,
 Turn'd to the arts of civil life.
 What grief severe must Rome engross,
 Widow'd at first by Leo's loss,
 And next by Cæsar's mournful night,
 Reft of her other shining light!
 Living, what region did not dread,
 What country not lament thee, dead?
 So kind to nations once subdued,
 So fierce to the barbarians rude,
 That those who feared not, must bewail,
 And such as grieved not, fears assail.
 Rome, thy departed glory moan,
 And weep thy luminaries gone."

§ 195. This Leo,¹ of whom the epitaph speaks, had been Roman pontiff, called to that eminence from being Bruno, bishop of Spire.² He was a man of great and admirable sanctity; and the Romans celebrate many of his miracles. He died before the emperor Henry, after a pontificate of five years.

Of St. Edward the Third, King and Confessor.

§ 196. In the year of our Lord's incarnation one thousand and forty-two, Edward the son of Ethelred assumed the sovereignty,³ and held it not quite twenty-four years—a man, from the simplicity of his manners, little calculated to govern, but devoted to God, and in consequence directed by Him; for while he continued to reign, there arose no popular commotions which were not immediately quelled. There was no foreign war; all was calm and peaceable, both at home and abroad, which is the more an object of wonder, because he conducted himself so mildly, that he would not even utter a word of reproach against the meanest person; for when upon one occasion he had gone out to hunt, and a countryman had overturned the stakes by which the deer are driven into the toils, struck with noble indignation, he exclaimed, "By God and his mother, I will serve you just such another turn, if ever it come in my way!" Here was a noble mind, who could forget that he was a king, under such circumstances, and could not think himself justified in injuring a man, even of the lowest condition. In the meantime, the regard which his subjects entertained for him was extreme, as was also the fear of foreigners; for God assisted his simplicity, that he might be feared who knew not how to be angry. But however indolent or unassuming he himself might be esteemed, he had nobles capable of elevating him to the highest pitch: for instance, Siward¹ earl of the Northumbrians, who at his command, engaging with Macbeth, the Scottish king, deprived him both of his life and of his kingdom, and placed on the throne Malcolm,² who was the son of the king of Cumbria. Again, Leofric of Hereford; he, with liberal regard, defended him against the enmity of Godwin,³ who, trusting to the consciousness of his own merits, paid little reverence to the king. Leofric and his wife Godiva, munificent in matters of religion, built many monasteries, as Coventry, St. Mary's Stow, Wenelok, Leon, and some others; to the rest he gave ornaments and estates; to Coventry he consigned his body, with a very large donation of gold and silver. Harold,⁴ too, of the West Saxons, the son of Godwin, who by his abilities slew two brothers, kings of the Welsh, Ris and Griffin, and reduced all that barbarous country to the state of a province under fealty to the king. Nevertheless, there were some things which obscured the glory of Edward's times: the monasteries were deprived of their monks; unjust sentences were passed by depraved men; his mother's property, at his command, was almost entirely taken from her. But the injustice of these transactions was extenuated by his favourers in the following manner: the ruin of the monasteries, and the iniquity of the judges, are said to have taken place without his knowledge, through the insolence of Godwin and his sons, who used to laugh at the easiness of the king; but afterwards, on being apprised of this, he severely avenged it by their banishment.⁵ His mother "had for a long time mocked at the needy state of her son," nor had she ever assisted him, transferring the hereditary hatred of the father to the child; for she had both loved Cnut more when living, and more commended him when dead; besides, accumulating money by every method, she had hoarded it, regardless of the poor, to whom she would give nothing, for fear of diminishing her heap. Wherefore, that which had been so unjustly gathered together, was not improperly taken away, that it might be of service to the poor, and replenish the king's exchequer. Though much credit is to be attached to those who relate these circumstances, yet I find her to have been a religiously disposed woman, and to have expended her property on ornaments for the church of Winchester, and probably upon others.⁶

But to return: Edward receiving the mournful intelligence of the death of Hardecnut, was lost in uncertainty what to do, or whither to betake himself. While he was revolving many things in his mind, it occurred as the better plan to submit his situation to the opinion of Godwin. To Godwin, therefore, he sent messengers, requesting that he might in security have a conference with him. Godwin, though for a long time hesitating and reflecting, at length assented; and when Edward came to him, and endeavoured to fall at his feet, he raised him up; and when relating the death of Hardecnut, and begging his assistance to effect his return to Normandy, Godwin made him the greatest promises. He said it was better for him to live with credit in power, than to die ingloriously in exile; that he was the son of Ethelred, and the grandson of Edgar; that the kingdom was his by right; that he was come to mature age, disciplined by difficulties, conversant in the art of well-governing from his years, and knowing from his former poverty how to feel for the miseries of the people; that if he thought fit to rely on him, there could be no obstacle, for his authority so preponderated in England, that wherever he inclined, there fortune was sure to favour; if he assisted him, none would dare to murmur; and just so was the contrary side of the question. Let him, then, only promise a firm friendship with himself, undiminished honours for his sons, and a marriage with his daughter; and he who was now shipwrecked almost of life and hope, and imploring the assistance of another, should shortly see himself a king.

§ 197. There was nothing which Edward would not promise, from the exigency of the time; so, fidelity being pledged on both sides, he confirmed by oath everything which was demanded. Soon after, convening an assembly at Gillingham,¹ Godwin having unfolded his reasons, caused him to be received as king, while homage was paid by all. He was a man of ready wit, and spoke fluently in the vernacular tongue; powerful in speech, powerful in bringing over the people to whatever he desired. Some yielded to his authority; some were influenced by presents; others admitted the right of Edward; and the few who resisted in defiance of justice and equity, were carefully marked, and afterwards driven out of England. Edward was crowned with great pomp at Winchester,² on Easter-day, and was instructed by Edsi,³ the archbishop, in the established rules of government: these, at the time, he treasured up with readiness in his memory, and afterwards displayed in the holiness of his conduct. The above-mentioned Edsi, in the following year, falling into an incurable disease, appointed as his successor Siward, abbot of Abingdon; communicating his design only to the king and the earl, lest any improper person should aspire to so great an eminence, either by solicitation or by purchase.⁴ Shortly after, the king took Edgitha, the daughter of Godwin, to wife;⁵ a woman whose bosom was the school of every liberal art, though little skilled in earthly matters: on seeing her, if you were amazed at her erudition,⁶ you must admire also the purity of her mind, and the beauty of her person. Both in her husband's lifetime, and afterwards, she was not entirely free from suspicion of dishonour; but when dying,⁷ in the time of king William, she voluntarily satisfied the bystanders as to her unimpaired chastity by an oath. When she became his wife, the king so artfully managed, that he neither removed her from his bed, nor knew her after the manner of men. I have not been able to discover whether he acted thus from dislike to her family, which he prudently dissembled from the exigency of the times, or out of pure regard to chastity; yet it is most notoriously affirmed, that he never violated his purity by connexion with any woman. But since I have gotten thus far, I wish to admonish my reader, that the track of my history is here but dubious, because the truth of the facts hangs in suspense. It is to be observed, that the king had sent for several Normans, who had formerly slightly ministered to his wants when in exile: one of these was Robert, whom from being a monk of Jumieges, he had appointed bishop of London, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury.¹ The English of our times vilify this person, together with the rest, as being the impeacher of Godwin and his sons, as the sower of discord, as the purchaser of the archbishopric; they say, too, that Godwin and his sons were men of liberal mind, the steadfast promoters and defenders of the government of Edward, and that it was not to be wondered at if they were indignant when they saw men of yesterday, and strangers, preferred to themselves; still, that they never uttered even a harsh word against the king whom they had formerly exalted to the throne. On the opposite hand, the Normans thus defend themselves: they allege that both Godwin and his sons acted with the greatest want of respect, as well as fidelity, to the king and his party, aiming at equal sovereignty with him, often ridiculing his simplicity, often hurling the shafts of their wit against him; that the Normans could not endure this, but endeavoured to weaken their power as much as possible. They say, too, that God manifested at last with what kind of purity Godwin had served him; for, after his piratical ravages, of which we shall speak hereafter, when he had been reinstated in his original favour, and was sitting with the king at table, the conversation turning on Elfred,² the king's brother, "I perceive," said he, "O king, that on every recollection of your brother, you regard me with angry countenance; but God forbid that I should swallow this morsel, if I have done anything which might tend either to his danger or your disadvantage." On saying this, he was choked with the piece he had put into his mouth, and closed his eyes in death;³ and being dragged from under the table by Harold his son, who stood near the king, he was buried in the cathedral of Winchester.

§ 198. On account of these discrepancies, as I have observed, my narrative labours under difficulties, for I cannot precisely ascertain the truth, by reason either of the natural dislike of these nations towards each other, or because the English disdainfully bear with a superior, and the Normans cannot endure an equal. In the following Book, however, when the opportunity occurs for relating the arrival of the Normans in England, I shall proceed to speak of their habits : at present I shall relate as accurately as I can¹ the grudge of the king against Godwin and his sons.

§ 199. Eustace earl of Boulogne, the father of Godfrey and Baldwin, who in our times were kings of Jerusalem,² had married the king's sister Goda, who had borne a son, named Ralph,³ to her former husband, Walter of Mantes. This son, at that time earl of Hereford, was both indolent and cowardly ; he had given way in battle to the Welsh, and left his country and the city, together with the bishop, to be consumed with fire by the enemy, the disgrace of which transaction was wiped off by the valour of Harold, who arrived opportunely. Eustace, therefore, crossing the channel from Whitsand to Dover, went to king Edward on some unknown business. When the conference was over, and he had obtained his request, he was returning through Dover, where one of his avant-couriers dealing too fiercely with a citizen, and demanding quarters with blows rather than by entreaty or remuneration, irritated him to such a degree that he put him to death. Eustace, on being informed of the fact, proceeded with all his retinue to revenge the murder of his servant, and kill the perpetrator of the crime, together with eighteen others ; but the citizens flying to arms, he lost twenty of his people, and had multitudes wounded, himself and one more with difficulty making their escape during the confusion. Thence returning to court and procuring a secret audience, he made the most of his own story, and excited the anger of the king against the English. Godwin being summoned by messengers, arrived at the palace. When the business was related, and the king was expatiating on the insolence of the citizens of Canterbury, the better informed discretion of this man perceived that sentence ought not to be pronounced, since the allegations had been heard on one side of the question only. In consequence, though the king ordered him directly to proceed with an army into Kent, to take signal vengeance on the people of Canterbury, still he refused, both because he saw with displeasure that all foreigners were gaining fast upon the favour of the king, and because he was desirous of evincing his regard towards his own countrymen. Besides, his opinion was more accordant with equity, as it should seem, which was that the principal people of that town should be mildly summoned to the king's court, on account of the tumult. If they could exculpate themselves, they should depart unhurt ; but if they could not, they must make atonement, either by money or by corporal punishment, to the king, whose peace they had broken, and to the earl whom they had injured : moreover, that it appeared unjust to pass sentence on those people unheard, who had a more especial right to protection. After this the conference broke up ; Godwin paying little attention to the indignation of the king, as merely momentary. In consequence of this, the nobility of the whole kingdom were commanded to meet at Gloucester, that the business might there be discussed in full assembly. Thither came those, at that time, most renowned Northumbrian earls, Syward and Leofric, and all the nobility of England. Godwin and his sons alone, who knew that they were suspected, not deeming it prudent to be present unarmed, halted with a strong force at Beverstane, giving out that he had assembled an army to restrain the Welsh, who, meditating a revolt from the king, had fortified a town in the county of Hereford, where Swane, one of the sons of Godwin, was at that time in command. The Welsh, however, who had come beforehand to the conference, had accused them of a conspiracy, and rendered them odious to the whole court, so that a rumour prevailed that the king's army would attack them in that very place. On hearing this, Godwin sounded the alarm to his party ; he told them that they should not purposely withstand their sovereign lord, but if it came to hostilities, they should not retreat without avenging themselves ; and, had not better counsels intervened, a dreadful scene of misery, and a worse than civil war, would have ensued. Some small share of amity between them, however, being restored, it was ordered that the council should be again assembled at London, and that Swane the son of Godwin should appease the king's anger by withdrawing himself ; that Godwin and Harold should come as speedily as possible to the council, with this condition, that they should be unarmed, bringing with them only twelve men, and should deliver up to the king the command of the troops which they had throughout England. This on the other hand they refused ; observing that they could not go to a meeting of people banded against them, without sureties and pledges ; that they would obey their lord in the surrender of the soldiers, as well as in everything else, except the risk of life and of reputation : should they come unarmed, their lives might be in danger ; if attended with few followers, it would detract from their glory. The king had made up his mind too firmly to listen to the entreaties of those who interceded with him ; wherefore an edict was published, that they should depart from England within five days. Godwin and Swane retired to Flanders, and Harold to Ireland. His earldom was given to Elgar, the son of Leofric, a man of active habits, who governed what he had received with ability, and readily restored it to Harold on his return. Afterwards, on the death of Godwin, when Harold had obtained the dukedom of his father, he boldly reclaimed it, though by the accusation of his enemies he was banished¹ for a time. All the property of the queen to the last penny was seized, and she herself was delivered into the custody of the king's sister at Warewell, lest she alone should be void of care, whilst all her relations were sighing for their country.

He succeeded his father, Eustace I., in 1049 ; and married, in 1150, Goda, daughter of king Athelbert, and widow of Gautier comte de Mantes, by whom he had no issue : but by his wife Ida he left three sons ; Eustace, who succeeded him ; Godefroi, created in 1076 marquis d'Anvers by the emperor Henry IV. and afterwards duc de Bouillon, was elected king of Jerusalem in 1099 (23d of July), and dying 18th of July, 1100, was succeeded by his brother Baudouin, comte d'Edesse.

The following year the exiles, each emerging from his station, were now cruising off the British Sea, infesting the coast with piracy, and carrying away rich booty from the substance of their countrymen. Against these, on the king's part, more than sixty sail lay at anchor: earls Odo and Ralph, relations of the king, were commanders of the fleet. Nor did this emergency find Edward himself inactive; since he would pass the night on ship-board, and watch the sallies of the plunderers, diligently compensating, by the wisdom of his counsel, for that personal service which age and infirmity denied. But when they had approached each other, and the conflict was on the eve of commencing, a very thick mist arising, in a moment obscured the sight of the opponents, and repressed the pitiable audacity of men. At last Godwin and his companions were driven, by the impetuosity of the wind, to the port which they had left; and not long after, returning to their own country with pacific dispositions, they found the king at London, and were received by him on soliciting pardon. The old man, skilled in leading the minds of his audience by his eloquence, dexterously exculpated himself from everything laid to his charge; and in a short time prevailed so far as to recover undiminished the honours of himself and of his children; to drive all the Normans, branded with ignominy, from England; and to get sentence passed on Robert the archbishop, and his accomplices, for disturbing the order of the kingdom, and stimulating the royal mind against his subjects. But he, not waiting for violent measures, had fled of his own accord while the treaties for peace were in agitation, and proceeding to Rome, and appealing to the apostolical see on his case, as he was returning through Jumieges, he there died, and was buried in the church of St. Mary, which he chiefly had built at vast expense. While he was yet living, Stigand,¹ who was bishop of Winchester, forthwith invaded the archbishopric of Canterbury: a prelate of notorious ambition, who sought after honours too keenly, and who, through desire of a higher dignity, deserting the bishopric of the South Saxons,² had occupied the see of Winchester, which he held along with the archbishopric. For this reason he was never honoured with the pall by the papal see, except that one Benedict,³ the usurper as it were of the papacy, sent him one; either corrupted by money to make this grant, or else because bad people are pleased to gratify others of the same description. But he, through the zeal of the faithful, being expelled by Nicholas,¹ who legally assumed the papacy after being bishop of Florence, laid aside the title he so little deserved. Stigand, moreover, in the time of king William, degraded² by the Roman cardinals and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, could not fill up the measure of his insatiable avidity even in death; for, on his decease, a small key was discovered among his secret recesses, which, on being applied to the lock of a chamber-cabinet, gave evidence of papers, describing immense treasures, and in which were noted both the quality and the quantity of the precious metals which this greedy pilferer had hidden on all his estates: but of this hereafter: I shall now complete the history of Godwin which I had begun.

§ 200. When a young man, he had taken Cnut's sister to wife, by whom he had a son, who in his early youth, while proudly curveting on a horse which his grandfather had given him, was carried into the Thames, and perished in the stream. His mother, too, paid the penalty of her cruelty, being killed by a stroke of lightning; for it is reported that she was in the habit of purchasing companies of slaves in England, and sending them into Denmark, more especially girls, whose beauty and age rendered them more valuable, that she might accumulate money by this horrid traffic. After her death he married another wife, whose descent I have not been able to trace;³ by her he had Harold, Swane, Tosti, Wulnod, Girth, and Leofwin. Harold became king for a few months after Edward; and being overcome by William at Hastings, there lost his life and kingdom, together with his two younger brothers. Wulnod, given by his father as an hostage, was sent over to Normandy by king Edward, where he remained all that king's time in inextricable captivity; and being sent back into England during William's reign, grew old in confinement at Salisbury. Swane being of an obstinate disposition, and faithless to the king, frequently revolted from his father and his brother Harold, and turning pirate, tarnished the virtues of his forefathers by his depredations on the coast. At last, struck with remorse for the murder of Bruno,⁴ a relation, or as some say, his brother, he went to Jerusalem, and returning thence was surprised by the Saracens, and put to death. Tosti, after the death of Siward, was preferred to the earldom of Northumbria by king Edward, and presided over

that province for nearly ten years,¹ at the end of which he drove the Northumbrians into rebellion by his severity: for finding him unattended, they drove him from the district, not deeming it proper to kill him from respect to his dignity; but they put to death his attendants both English and Danes, and appropriated to their own use his horses, his army, and his effects. As soon as this rumour and the distracted state of that district reached the king, Harold set forward to avenge the outrage. The Northumbrians, though not inferior in point of numbers, yet preferring peace, excused themselves to him for the transaction; averring that they were a people free born and freely educated, and unable to tolerate the cruelty of any prince; that they had been taught by their ancestors either to be free or to die: did the king wish them to be obedient, he should appoint Marcher the son of Elgar to preside over them, who would experience how cheerfully they could obey, provided they were treated with gentleness. On hearing this, Harold, who regarded the quiet of the country more than the advantage of his brother, recalled his army, and, after waiting on the king, settled the earldom on Marcher. Tosti, enraged against every one, retired with his wife and children to Flanders, and continued there till the death of Edward: but this I shall delay mentioning, while I record what, as I have learnt from ancient men, happened in his time at Rome.

§ 201. ² Pope Gregory the Sixth, first called Gratian, was a man of great piety and austerity. He found the power of the Roman pontificate so reduced by the negligence of his predecessors, that, with the exception of a few neighbouring towns, and the offerings of the faithful, he had scarcely anything whereon to subsist. The cities and possessions at a distance, which were the property of the church, were forcibly seized by plunderers; the public roads and highways throughout all Italy were thronged with robbers to such a degree, that no pilgrim could pass in safety, unless strongly guarded. Swarms of thieves beset every path, nor could the traveller devise any method of escaping them: they robbed alike the poor and the rich; entreaty or resistance were alike unavailing. The journey to Rome was discontinued by every nation, as every man would much rather contribute his money to the churches in his own country, than feed a set of plunderers with the produce of his labours. And what was the state of that city which of old was the only dwelling-place of holiness? Of a truth, there assassins, a crafty and abandoned set of men, were roaming in the very Forum. Had any one by stratagem eluded the people who lay in wait for him upon the road, anxious, even at the peril of destruction, to see the church of the apostle; even then, encountering these robbers, he was never able to return home without the loss either of property or of life. Even over the very bodies of the holy apostles and martyrs, even on the sacred altars, were swords unsheathed, and the offerings of pilgrims, ere well laid out of their hands, were snatched away, and consumed in drunkenness and fornication. The papacy of Gregory was greeted by this storm of evils. At first he began to deal gently with his subjects, and, as became a pontiff, rather by love than by terror: he repressed the delinquents more by words than by blows; he entreated the townsmen to abstain from the molestation of pilgrims, and the plunder of sacred offerings. The one, he said, was contrary to nature, that the man who breathed the common air, could not enjoy the common peace; that Christians surely ought to have liberty of proceeding whither they pleased among Christians, since they were all of the same household, all united by the tie of the same blood, all redeemed by the same price; the other, he said, was contrary to the command of God, who had ordained, that "they who wait at the altar are partakers with the altar."¹ Moreover, that the house of God ought to be the house of prayer, not a den of thieves,² nor an assembly of gladiators; that they should allow the offerings to go to the use of the priests, or the support of the poor; that he would provide for those persons whom want had compelled to plunder, by giving them some honest employment to procure their subsistence; that such as were instigated by avaricious desire, should desist immediately, for the love of God and the credit of the world. He invited, by mandates³ and epistles, those who had invaded the patrimony of the church to restore what did not belong to them, or else to prove in the Roman senate that they held it justly: if they would do neither, they must be told that they were no longer members of the church, since they opposed St. Peter, the head of the church, and his vicar. Perpetually haranguing to this effect, and little or nothing profiting by it, he endeavoured to cure the inveterate disorder by having recourse to harsher remedies. He then separated from the body of the church, by the brand of excommunication, all who were guilty of such practices, and even those who associated or conversed with the delinquents. Though he acted strictly according to his duty, yet his diligence in this business had well-nigh proved his destruction; for as one says, "He that reproveth a scorner, getteth to himself shame;"⁴ so the abandoned crew began to kick against this gentle admonition, to utter their threats aloud, to clash their arms around the walls of the city, so as nearly even to kill the pope. Finding it now absolutely necessary to cut short the evil, he procured arms and horses from every side, and equipped troops of horse and foot: taking possession, in the first place, of the church of St. Peter, he either killed or put to flight the plunderers of the oblations. As fortune appeared to favour his designs, he proceeded farther, and dispatching all who dared to resist, restored to their original jurisdiction all the estates and towns which had been for a considerable time lost. In this manner peace, which had been long driven into banishment by the negligence of many, was restored to the country by the exertions of an individual. Pilgrims now began securely to travel on the public ways, which had been deserted; they feasted their eyes with pleasure on the ancient wonders within the city; and having made their offerings, they returned home with songs of joy. In the meantime, the common people of Rome, who had been accustomed to live by theft, began to call him sanguinary, and not worthy to offer sacrifice to God, since he was stained by so many murders; and as it generally happens that the contagion of slander spreads universally, even the cardinals themselves joined in the sentiments of the people; so that when this holy man was confined with the sickness which proved his death, they, after consulting among themselves, with matchless insolence recommended him not to think of ordering himself to be buried in the church of St. Peter with the rest of the popes, since he had polluted his office, by being accessory to the death of so many men. Resuming spirit, however, and sternly regarding them, he addressed them in the following manner:—

² This character of Gregory must be accepted with considerable caution. The duration of his pontificate extends from 1st May 1045, to 24th Dec. 1046, when he was deposed, and his successor, Clement II., appointed.

§ 202. “ If you possessed either a single spark of human reason, or of the knowledge of divine truth, you would hardly have approached your pontiff with so inconsiderate an address; for throughout my whole life, I have dissipated my own patrimony for your advantage, and, at last, have sacrificed the applause of the world for your rescue. If any other persons were to allege what you urge in defamation of me, it would become you to silence them by explaining away the false opinions of fools. For whom, I pray you, have I laid up treasure? for myself, perhaps: and yet I already possessed the treasures of my predecessors, which were enough for any man's covetousness. To whom have I restored safety and liberty? you will reply, to myself, perhaps: and yet I was adored by the people, and did, without restraint, whatever I pleased; every mouth was filled with my praises, every day resounded my applause. These praises and these applauses have been lost to me, through my concern for your poverty. Towards you I turned my thoughts, and found that I must adopt severer measures. A sacrilegious robber fattened on the produce of your property, while your subsistence was only from day to day: he, from the offerings belonging to you, was clad in costly silk; while your mean and tattered clothing absolutely grieved my sight. In consequence, when I could endure this no longer, I acted with hostility to others, that I might get credit for the clergy, though at the loss of the citizens. However, I now find I have lavished my favours on the ungrateful; for you publicly proclaim, what others mutter only in secret. I approve, indeed, freedom of speech, but I look for respectful behaviour. A dying parent is persecuted by his sons concerning his burial. Will you deny me the common home of all? The harlot, the usurer, the robber, are not forbidden an entrance to the church; and do you refuse it to the pope? What signifies it whether the dead or the living enter the sanctuary, except it be that the living is subject to many temptations, so that he cannot be free from stain, even in the church; often finding matter of sin, in the very place where he had come to wash it away; whereas the dead knows not how; nay, he who wants only his last sad office, has not the power, to sin. What savage barbarity then is it to exclude from the house of God, him in whom both the inclination and the power of sinning have ceased. Repent then, my sons, of your precipitate boldness, if perchance God may forgive you this crime, for you have spoken both foolishly and bitterly even to this present hour. But that you may not suppose me to rest merely on my own authority, listen to reason: every act of man ought to be considered according to the intention of his heart, that the examination of the deed may proceed to that point whence the design originated. I am deceived if the Word of Truth does not say the same; 'If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness.' A wretched pauper hath often come to me to relieve his distress; and as I knew not what was about to happen, I have presented him with divers pieces of money, and dismissed him. On his departure he has met with a thief on the public road, has incautiously fallen into conversation with him, proclaimed the kindness of the apostolical see, and, to prove the truth of his words, produced the purse. On their journey, the way has been beguiled with various discourse, until the dissembler, loitering somewhat behind, has felled the stranger with a club, and immediately dispatched him; and, after carrying off his money, has boasted of a murder, which his thirst for plunder had excited. Can you therefore justly accuse me for giving that to a stranger which was the cause of his death? for even the most cruel person would not murder a man unless he hoped to fill his pockets with his money. What shall I say of civil and ecclesiastical laws? By these is not the self-same fact both punished and approved, under different circumstances? The thief is punished for murdering a man in secret; whereas the soldier is applauded, who destroys his enemy in battle; the homicide, then, is ignominious in the one and laudable in the other, as the latter slew the man for the safety of his country, the former for the gratification of his desire for plunder. My predecessor Adrian the First, of renowned memory, was applauded for giving up the investiture of the churches to Charles the Great; so that no person elected could be consecrated by the bishop till the king had first dignified him with the ring and staff; on the other hand, the pontiffs of our time have gotten credit for taking away these appointments from the princes. What at that time, then, might reasonably be granted, may at the present be reasonably taken away. But why so? because the mind of Charles the Great was not assailable by avarice, nor could any person easily find access, unless he entered by the door: besides, at so vast a distance it could not be required of the papal see to grant its consent to each person elected, so long as there was a king at hand who disposed of nothing through avarice, but always appointed religious persons to the churches, according to the sacred ordinances of the canons. At the present time, luxury and ambition have beset every king's palace; wherefore the spouse of Christ deservedly asserts her liberty, lest a tyrant should prostitute her to an ambitious usurper. Thus, on either side, may my cause be denied or affirmed; it is not the office of a bishop to authorize war;¹ but it belongs to a bishop's function, if he see innocence made shipwreck of, to oppose it both by deed and word. Ezechiel accuses the priests for not strongly opposing, and holding forth a shield for the house of Israel, in the day of the Lord. Now there are two persons in the church of God, appointed for the purpose of repressing crimes; one who can rebuke sharply, the other who can wield the sword. I, as you can witness for me, have not neglected my part; as far as I saw it could profit I did rebuke sharply: I sent a message to him whose business it was to bear the sword; he wrote me word back that he was occupied in his war with the Vandals, entreating me not to spare my labour, or his expense, in breaking up the meetings of the plunderers. If I had refused what excuse could I offer to God, after the emperor had delegated his office to me? Could I see the murder of the townspeople, the robbery of the pilgrims, and yet slumber on? But he who spares a thief kills the innocent. Yet it will be objected that it is not the part of a priest to defile himself with the blood of any one. I grant it: but he does not defile himself who frees the innocent by the destruction of the guilty. Blessed, truly blessed are they who always keep judgment and do justice. Phineas and Mattathias were priests most renowned in fame; both crowned with the sacred mitre, and both habited in sacerdotal garb, and yet they both punished the wicked with their own hands. The one transfixed the guilty couple with a javelin; the other mingled the blood of the sacrificer with the sacrifice.² If then those persons, regarding, as it were, the thick darkness of the law, were carried away by a divine zeal for those shadowy mysteries, shall we, who see the truth with perfect clearness, suffer our sacred things to be profaned? Azarias³ the priest drove away king Ozias when offering incense, and no doubt would have killed him, had he not quickly departed; the Divine vengeance however anticipated the hand of the priest, for a leprosy preyed on the body of the man whose mind had coveted unlawful things. The devotion of a king was disturbed, and shall not the desires of a thief be so? It is not enough to excuse, I even applaud, this my conduct; indeed I have conferred a benefit on the very persons I seem to have destroyed: I have diminished their punishment in accelerating their deaths. The longer a wicked man lives, the more he will sin, unless he be one whom God hath graciously reserved for a singular example. Death in general is good for all; for by it the just man finds repose in heaven, the unjust ceases from his crimes, the bad man puts an end to his guilt; the good proceeds to his prize; the saint draws nigh to his reward; the sinner looks forward to pardon, because death has fixed a boundary to his transgressions. Surely then I ought to be thanked on behalf of those who through my conduct have been exempted from so many sufferings. I have urged these matters in my own defence, and to invalidate your assertions. However, since both your reasoning and mine may be fallacious, let us commit all to the decision of God; place my body, laid out in the manner of my predecessors, before the gates of the church, and let them be secured with locks and bars: if God be willing that I should enter, you will hail a miracle; if not, do with my dead body according to your inclination."

§ 203. Struck by this address, when he had breathed his last, they carried out the remains of the departed prelate before the doors, which were strongly fastened; and presently a whirlwind, sent by God, broke every opposing bolt, and drove the very doors, with the utmost violence, against the walls. The surrounding people applaud with joy, and the body of the pontiff was interred, with all due respect, by the side of the other popes.

Of the Witch who was dragged out of a Church by Devils.

§ 204. At the same time something similar occurred in England, not by divine miracle, but by infernal craft; which when I shall have related, the credit of the narrative will not be shaken, though the minds of the hearers should be incredulous; for I have heard it from a man of such character that he would swear he had seen it, and I should be ashamed to disbelieve him. There resided at Berkeley a woman addicted to witchcraft, as it afterwards appeared, and skilled in ancient augury; she was excessively gluttonous, perfectly lascivious, setting no bounds to her debaucheries, as she was not old, though treading fast towards the confines of age. On a certain day, as she was regaling, a jack-daw, which was a very great favourite, chattered something more loudly than usual; on hearing which the woman's knife fell from her hand, her countenance grew pale,—and deeply groaning, "This day," said she, "my plough hath completed its last furrow; to-day I shall hear of, and suffer, some dreadful calamity." While yet speaking, the messenger of her misfortunes arrived; and being asked why he approached with so distressed an air; "I bring news," said he, "from that village," naming the place, "of the death of your son, and of the whole family, by a sudden accident." At this intelligence the woman, sorely afflicted, immediately took to her bed, and perceiving her disorder rapidly approaching the vitals, she summoned her surviving children, a monk and a nun, by hasty letters; and, when they arrived, with faltering voice, she thus addressed them:—"Hitherto, my children, I have, to my own miserable destruction, devoted myself to demoniacal arts; I have been the sink of every vice, the teacher of every allurements. Yet, while practising these crimes, I was accustomed to soothe my hapless soul with the hope of your piety; despairing of myself, I rested my expectations on you; I advanced you as my defenders against evil spirits, my safeguards against my strongest foes. Now, since I have approached the end of my life, and shall have those eager to punish who lured me to sin, I entreat you by your mother's breasts, if you have any regard, any affection, at least to endeavour to alleviate my torments; and, although you cannot revoke the sentence already passed upon my soul, yet you may, perhaps, rescue my body by these means. Sew up my corpse in the skin of a stag; lay it on its back in a stone coffin; fasten down the lid with lead and iron; on this lay a stone, bound round with three iron chains of enormous weight; let there be fifty psalms sung for me by night, and as many masses by day, to allay the ferocious attacks of my adversaries. If I lie thus secure for three nights, on the fourth day bury your mother in the ground; although I fear, lest the earth, which has been so often burdened with my crimes, should refuse to receive and cherish me in her bosom." They did their utmost to comply with her injunctions; but, alas! vain were pious tears, vows, or entreaties; so great was the woman's guilt, so great the devil's violence. For on the first two nights, while the choir of priests was singing psalms around the body, the devils, one by one, with the utmost ease bursting open the door of the church, though closed with an immense bolt, broke asunder the two outer chains; the middle one being more laboriously wrought, remained entire. On the third night, about cock-crow, the whole monastery seemed to be overthrown from its very foundation, by the clamour of the approaching enemy. One devil, more terrible in appearance than the rest, and of loftier stature, broke the gates to shivers by the violence of his attack. The priests grew motionless with fear, their hair stood on end, and they became speechless.¹ He proceeded, as it appeared, with haughty step towards the coffin, and calling on the woman by name, commanded her to rise. She replying that she could not on account of the chains: "you shall be loosed," said he, "and to your cost;" and directly he broke the chain, which had mocked the ferocity of the others, with as little exertion as though it had been made of flax. He also beat down the cover of the coffin with his foot, and taking her by the hand, before them all, he dragged them out of the church. At the doors appeared a black horse, proudly neighing, with iron hooks projecting over his whole back; on which the wretched creature was placed, and, immediately, with the whole party, vanished from the eyes of the beholders; her pitiable cries, however, for assistance, were heard for nearly the space of four miles. No person will deem this incredible who has read St. Gregory's dialogues;² who tells, in his fourth book, of a wicked man who had been buried in a church, and was cast out of doors again by devils. Among the French also, what I am about to relate is frequently mentioned. Charles Martel, a man of renowned valour, who obliged the Saracens, when they had invaded France, to retire to Spain, was, at his death, buried in the church of St. Denys; but as he had seized much of the property of almost all the monasteries in France for the purpose of paying his soldiers, he was visibly taken away from his tomb by evil spirits, and has no where been seen to this day. At length this was revealed to the bishop of Orleans, and by him publicly made known.

Of the Ring that was put on the Finger of a Statue.

§ 205. But to return to Rome : there was a citizen¹ of this place, youthful, rich, and of senatorial rank, who had recently married ; and who, calling together his companions, had made a plentiful entertainment. After the repast, when by moderate drinking they had excited hilarity, they went out into the field to promote digestion, either by leaping, or hurling, or some other exercise. The master of the banquet, who was leader of the game, called for a ball to play with, and in the meantime placed the wedding-ring on the outstretched finger of a brazen statue which stood close at hand. But when almost all the others had attacked him alone, tired with the violence of the exercise, he left off playing first, and going to resume his ring, he saw the finger of the statue clenched fast in the palm. Finding, after many attempts, that he was unable either to force it off, or to break the finger, he retired in silence ; concealing the matter from his companions, lest they should laugh at him at the moment, or carry off the ring when he was gone. Returning thither with some servants in the dead of night, he was surprised to find the finger again extended, and the ring taken away. Dissembling his loss, he was soothed by the blandishments of his bride. When the hour of rest arrived, and he had placed himself by the side of his spouse, he was conscious of something dense and cloud-like rolling between them, which might be felt, though not seen, and by this means was impeded in his embraces ; he heard a voice too, saying, “ Embrace me, since you wedded me to-day ; I am Venus, on whose finger you put the ring ; I have it, nor will I restore it.” Terrified at such a prodigy, he had neither courage nor ability to reply, and passed a sleepless night in silent reflection upon the matter. A considerable space of time elapsed in this way ; as often as he was desirous of the embraces of his wife, the same circumstance ever occurred ; while in other respects, he was perfectly equal to any avocation, civil or military. At length, urged by the complaints of his consort, he detailed the matter to her parents, who, after deliberating for a time, disclosed it to one Palambus, a suburban priest. This man was skilled in necromancy, could raise up magical figures, terrify devils, and compel them to do anything he chose. Having bargained for a liberal reward, provided he succeeded in rendering the lovers happy, he called up all the powers of his art, and gave the young man a letter which he had prepared, saying, “ Go, at such an hour of the night, into the high road, where it divides into four several ways, and stand there in silent expectation. There will pass by human figures of either sex, of every age, rank, and condition ; some on horseback, some on foot ; some with countenances dejected, others elated with full-swollen insolence ; in short, you will perceive in their looks and gestures every token both of joy and of grief ; though these should address you, enter into conversation with none of them. This company will be followed by a person taller, and more corpulent than the rest, sitting in a chariot; to him you will, in silence, give the letter to read, and immediately your wish will be accomplished, provided you act with resolution." The young man took the road he was commanded; and, at night, standing in the open air, experienced the truth of the priest's assertion by every thing which he saw; there was nothing but what was completed to a tittle. Among other passing figures he beheld a woman, in meretricious garb, riding on a mule; her hair, which was bound above in a golden fillet, floated unconfined on her shoulders; in her hand was a golden wand, with which she directed the progress of her beast; she was so thinly clad, as to be almost naked, and her gestures were wonderfully indecent. But what need of more? At last came the chief, in appearance, who, from his chariot adorned with emeralds and pearls, fixing his eyes most sternly on the young man, demanded the cause of his presence. He made no reply, but stretching out his hand, gave him the letter. The demon, not daring to despise the well-known seal, read the epistle, and immediately, lifting up his hands to heaven, "Almighty God,"¹ said he, "how long wilt Thou endure the crimes of the priest Palumbus?" The devil then directly sent some of those about him to take the ring by force from Venus, who restored it at last, though with great reluctance. The young man thus obtaining his object, became possessed of his long-desired pleasures without farther obstacle; but Palumbus, on hearing of the devil's complaint to God concerning him, understood that the close of his days was predicted. In consequence, making a pitiable atonement by voluntarily cutting off all his limbs, he confessed unheard-of crimes to the pope in the presence of the Roman people.

Concerning the Body of Pallas, Son of Evander.

§ 206. At that time the body of Pallas, the son of Evander, of whom Virgil² speaks, was found entire at Rome, to the great astonishment of all, having escaped corruption for so many ages. Such, however, is the nature of bodies embalmed, that when the flesh decays, the skin preserves the nerves, and the nerves the bones. The gash which Turnus had made in the middle of his breast measured four feet and an half. His epitaph was found to this effect:—

"Pallas, Evander's son, whom Turnus' spear Slew, like all others whom it reached, lies here."

Which epitaph I should not think was made at the time, though Carmentis, the mother of Evander, is reported to have invented the Roman letters, but that it was composed by Ennius, or some other ancient poet. There was a burning lamp at his head, constructed by magical art, so that no violent blast, no dripping of water could extinguish it. While many were lost in admiration at this, one person, as there are also some people expert in mischief, made an aperture beneath the flame with an iron style, which introducing the air, the light vanished. The body, when set up against the wall, surpassed it in height, but some days afterwards, being drenched with the drip of the caves, it acknowledged the corruption common to mortals; the skin and the nerves dissolving.

Of a Woman who had two Bodies.

§ 207. At that time too, on the confines of Brittany and Normandy, a prodigy was seen in one, or more properly speaking, in two women: there were two heads, four arms, and every other part two-fold to the navel; beneath, were two legs, two feet, and all other parts single. While one was laughing, eating, or speaking, the other would cry, fast, or remain silent: though both mouths ate, yet there was only one passage. At last, one dying, the other survived, and the living carried about the dead, for the space of three years, till she died also, through the fatigue of the weight, and the stench of the dead carcase.

Many were of opinion, and some even have written, that these women represented England and Normandy, which, though separated by position, are yet united under one master. Whatever wealth these countries greedily absorb, flows into one common receptacle, which is either the covetousness of their princes, or the ferocity of surrounding nations. England yet vigorous, supports with her wealth Normandy now dead and almost decayed, until she herself perhaps shall fall through the violence of spoilers. Happy if she shall ever again breathe that liberty the mere shadow of which she has long pursued! She now mourns, borne down with calamity, and oppressed with exactions; the causes of which misery I shall relate, after I have despatched some things pertaining to my subject. For since I have hitherto recorded the civil and military transactions of the kings of England, I may be allowed to expatiate somewhat on the sanctity of certain of them; and at the same time to contemplate what splendour of divine love beamed on this people, from the first dawning of their faith: since I believe you can no where find the bodies of so many saints entire after death, typifying the state of final incorruption. I imagine this to have taken place by God's agency, in order that a nation, situated, as it were, almost out of the world, should more confidently embrace the hope of a resurrection, contemplating the incorruption of the saints. There are, altogether, five which I have known of, (though the residents in many places boast of more;) Saint Etheldritha,¹ and Wiburga,² virgins; king Edmund;³ archbishop

³ King of East-Anglia; he was martyred on the 20th of November in the year 870. See § 96.

Elfeg;¹ and Cuthbert² the ancient father: who with skin and flesh unwasted, and their joints flexile, the last-named also having a certain vital warmth about him, appear to be merely sleeping. Who can enumerate all the other saints, of different ranks and professions, whose names and lives I have neither intention nor leisure singly to describe? yet oh, that I might hereafter have leisure! But I will be silent, lest I should seem to promise more than I can perform. In consequence, it is not necessary to mention any of the commonalty, but merely, (not to go out of the path of the history which I have commenced,) to specify the male and female offshoots of the royal stock, most of them innocently murdered; and who have been consecrated martyrs, not by human conjecture, but by divine acknowledgment: whence may be known how little indulgence they gave to the lust of pleasure, who inherited eternal glory by means of so easy a death.

§ 208. In the former book,³ my history dwelt for some time on the praises of the most holy Oswald, king and martyr; among whose other marks of sanctity was this, which, according to some copies,⁴ is related in the History of the Angles.⁵ In the monastery at Selsey, which Wilfrid,⁶ of holy memory, had filled with Northumbrian monks, a dreadful malady broke out and destroyed numbers; the remainder endeavoured to avert the pestilence by a fast of three days. On the second day of the fast, the blessed apostles Peter and Paul appeared to a youth who was sick with the disorder, and animated him by observing that he should not fear approaching death, as it would be a termination of his present illness, and an entrance into eternal life; that no other person of that monastery would die of this disorder, because God had granted this to the merits of the noble king Oswald, who was that very day supplicating for his countrymen: for it was on this day that the king, murdered by the faithless, had in a moment ascended to the heavenly tribunal: that they should search therefore in the book, in which the names of the dead were written, and if they found it so, they should put an end to the fast, give loose to security and joy, and sing solemn masses to God, and to the holy king. This vision being quickly followed by the death of the boy, and the anniversary of the martyr being found in the martyrology, and at the same time the cessation of the disorder being attested by the whole province, the name of Oswald was from that period inserted among the martyrs, which before, on account of his recent death, had only been admitted into the list of the faithful. Deservedly, I say, then, deservedly is he to be celebrated, whose glory God's approbation so signally manifested, as to order him to be dignified with masses, in a manner, as I think, not usual among men. The undoubted veracity of the historian precludes the possibility of supposing this matter to be false, as does also the blessed bishop Acca,¹ who was the colleague of the author.

² St. Cuthbert, sixth bishop and patron-saint of Lindisfarne, concerning whom see the History of the Church of Durham, by Simeon, which will be given in a subsequent volume of this series. In the year 1827 Cuthbert's tomb was opened a third time; a full and interesting account of the robes and reliques therein found has been published by the Rev. Mr. Raine of Durham (4to. Durham, 1828.)

§ 209. Egbert, king of Kent, the son of Ercombert, whom I have mentioned before,² had some very near relations, descended from the royal line; their names were Ethelred and Egelbirt,³ the sons of Ermenred his uncle. Apprehensive that they might grow up with notions of succeeding to the kingdom, and fearful for his safety, he kept them about him for some time, with very homely entertainment; and, at last, grudging them his regards, he removed them from his court: and soon after, when they had been secretly dispatched by one of his servants, named Thunre, (which signifies Thunder,) he buried them under heaps of rubbish, thinking that a murder perpetrated in privacy would escape detection. The eye of God, however, which no secrets of the heart can deceive, brought the innocents to light, vouchsafing many cures upon the spot; until the neighbours, being roused, dug up the unsightly heaps of turf and rubbish cast upon their bodies, and forming a trench after the manner of a sepulchre, they erected a small church over it. There they remained till the time of king Edgar, when they were taken up by the blessed Oswald, archbishop⁴ of Worcester, and conveyed to the monastery of Ramsey; from which period, granting the petitions of the suppliant, they have manifested themselves by many miracles.

§ 210. Offa, king of the Mercians, murdered many persons of consequence for the security, as he supposed, of his kingdom, without any distinction of friend or foe; among these was king Egelbirt; thereby being guilty of an atrocious outrage against the suitor of his daughter. His unmerited death, however, is thought, as I have before mentioned, to have been amply avenged by the short reign of Offa's son.⁵ Indeed God signalized his sanctity by such evident tokens, that at this very day the episcopal church of Hereford is consecrated to his name. Nor should anything appear idle or irrelevant, which our pious and religious ancestors have either admitted by their silence, or confirmed by their authority.

§ 211. What shall my pen here trace worthy of St. Kenelm,⁶ a youth of tender age? Kenulf, king of the Mercians, his father, had consigned him, when seven years old, to his sister Quendrida, for the purpose of education: but she, falsely entertaining hopes of the kingdom for herself, gave her little brother in charge to a servant of her household, with an order to murder him. Taking out the innocent, under pretence of hunting for his amusement, he murdered him and hid him in a thicket. But strange to tell, the crime which had been so secretly committed in England, gained publicity in Rome, by God's agency; for a dove from heaven bore a parchment scroll to the altar of St. Peter, containing an exact account both of his death, and place of burial : but as it was written in the English language, it was vainly attempted to be read by the Romans and men of other nations who were present. Fortunately, however, and opportunely, an Englishman was at hand, who, translating the writing to the Roman people into Latin, gave occasion to the pope to write a letter to the kings of England, acquainting them with the martyrdom of their countryman. In consequence, in presence of a numerous assembly, the body of the innocent was taken up and removed to Winchelcumbe. The murderous woman was so indignant at the vocal chant of the priests and loud applause of the laity, that she thrust out her head from the window of the chamber where she was standing, and, by chance, having in her hands a psalter, she came in course of reading to the psalm, "Oh God of my praise," which, for I know not what charm, reading backwards, she thereby endeavoured to drown the joy of the choristers. At that moment, the witch's eyes, torn by divine vengeance from their hollow sockets, scattered blood upon the verse which runs, "This is the work of them who defame me to the Lord, and who speak evil against my soul."¹ The marks of her blood are still extant, proving the cruelty of the woman, and the vengeance of God. The body of the little saint is very generally revered, and hardly is there any place in England more venerated, or where greater numbers of persons attend at the festival ; and this is due to the long-continued belief of his sanctity, and the constant exhibition of his miracles.

§ 212. Nor shall my history be wanting in thy praise, Wistan,² blessed youth, son of Wimund, son of Wihthlaf king of the Mercians, and of Elhfræda, daughter of Chelwulf, who was the uncle of Kenelm ; I will not, I say, pass thee over in silence, whom Berfert thy relation so atrociously murdered. And let posterity know, if they deem this history worthy of perusal, that there was nothing earthly more praiseworthy than your disposition ; at which a deadly assassin becoming irritated, dispatched you ; nor was there any thing more innocent than your purity towards God ; invited by which, the secret judge deemed it fitting to honour you ; for a column of light, sent down from heaven, piercing the sable robe of night, revealed the wickedness of the deep cavern, and brought to view the crime of the murderer. In consequence, Wistan's venerable remains were taken up, and by the care of his relations conveyed to Rapendun ;³ at that time a famous monastery, now a vill belonging to the earl of Chester, and its glory grown obsolete with age ; but at present thou dwellest at Evesham, kindly favouring the petitions of such as regard thee.

§ 213. Beda has related many anecdotes of the sanctity of the kings of the East Saxons and East Angles, whose genealogy I have in the first book⁴ of this work traced briefly, because I could nowhere find a complete history of the kings. I shall, however, dilate somewhat on St. Edmund,⁵ who held dominion in East Anglia, and to whom the time of Beda did not extend. That province, on the south and east, is surrounded by the ocean; on the north by deep lakes and stagnant pools, which, stretching out to a vast distance in length, with a breadth of two or three miles, afford abundance of fish for the use of the inhabitants; on the west it is continuous with the rest of the island, but defended by the earth being thrown up in the form of a rampart. The soil is admirable for pasture and for hunting; it is full of monasteries, and large bodies of monks are settled on the islands of these stagnant waters; the people are a merry, pleasant, jocund race, though apt to carry their jokes to excess. Here,¹ then, reigned Edmund, a man devoted to God, ennobled by his descent from ancient kings, and though he presided over the province in peace for several years, yet never through the effeminacy of the times did he relax his courage. Hinguar and Hubba, two leaders of the Danes, came over to depopulate the provinces of the Northumbrians and East Angles. The former of these seized the unresisting king, who had cast away his arms and was lying on the ground in prayer, and, after the infliction of tortures,² beheaded him. On the death of this saintly man, the purity of his past life was evidenced by unheard-of miracles. The Danes had cast away the head, when severed from the body by the cruelty of the executioners, and it had been hidden in a thicket: while his subjects, who had tracked the footsteps of the enemy as they departed, were seeking it, intending to solemnize with due honour the funeral rites of their king, they were struck with the pleasing intervention of God; for the lifeless head uttered a voice, inviting all who were in search of it to approach. A wolf, a beast accustomed to prey upon dead carcases, was holding it in its paws, and guarding it untouched; which animal also, after the manner of a tame creature, gently followed the bearers to the tomb, and neither did nor received any injury. The sacred body was then, for a time, committed to the earth; turf was placed over it, and a wooden chapel, of trifling cost, was erected. The negligent natives, however, were soon made sensible of the virtue of the martyr, which excited their listless minds to reverence him by the miracles which he performed: and though perhaps the first proof of his power may appear weak and trivial, yet nevertheless I shall subjoin it. He bound, with invisible bands, some thieves who had endeavoured to break into the church by night; this was done in the very attempt; a pleasant spectacle enough, to see the object of plunder hold fast the thieves, so that they could neither desist from their enterprise nor complete their design. In consequence, Theodred bishop of London, who lies at St. Paul's, removed the lasting disgrace of so mean a structure, by building a nobler edifice over those sacred limbs, which evidenced the glory of his unspotted soul, by surprising soundness, and a kind of milky whiteness. The head, which was formerly divided from the neck, is again united to the rest of the body, showing only the sign of martyrdom by a purple seam. One circumstance indeed surpasses human miracles, which is, that the hair and nails of the dead man continue to grow; these, Oswen, an holy woman, used yearly to clip and cut, that they might be objects of veneration to posterity. Truly this was an holy temerity, for a woman to contemplate and handle limbs superior to the whole of this world. Not so Lefstan, a youth of bold and untamed insolence, who, with many impertinent threats, commanded the body of the martyr to be shown to him; desirous, as he said, of settling the uncertainty of report by the testimony of his eyesight. He paid dearly, however, for his audacious experiment; becoming insane, and, shortly after, dying, swarming with worms. He felt indeed that Edmund was now capable of doing what he before used to do; that is,— by which means he so completely engaged the inhabitants of all Britain to him, that every person looked upon himself as particularly happy, in contributing either money or other gifts to St. Edmund's monastery. Even kings themselves, the masters of others, used to boast of being his servants, and sent him their royal crown, redeeming it, if they wished to use it, at a great price. The exactors of taxes also, who, in other places, gave loose to injustice, making no distinction between right and wrong, were there suppliant, and ceased their cavilling at St. Edmund's boundary,¹ admonished thereto by the punishment of others who had presumed to overpass it.

§ 214. My commendations shall also glance at the names of some maidens of the royal race, though I must claim indulgence for being brief upon the subject, not through fastidiousness, but because I am unacquainted with their miracles. Anna king of the East Angles had three daughters, Etheldritha, Ethelburga, and Sexburga. Etheldritha, though married to two husbands, yet by means of saintly continence, so Beda relates,² without any diminution of modesty, without a single sensual inclination, triumphantly displayed to heaven the palm of perpetual virginity. Ethelburga, first a nun, and afterwards abbess, in a monastery in France called Brigæ,³ was celebrated for unblemished chastity; and it is well worthy of remark, that as both sisters had subdued the lusts of the flesh while living, so, when dead, their bodies remained uncorrupt, the one in England and the other in France; insomuch, that their sanctity, which is abundantly resplendent, “may suffice to irradiate both poles.” Sexburga was married to Ercombert king of Kent, and after his death, taking the veil in the same monastery with her sister Etheldreda, was proclaimed a saint. She had two daughters by king Ercombert, Ercongota, and Ermenilda; of Ercongota, such as wish for information will find it in Beda;⁴ Ermenilda married

Wulfer, king of the Mercians, and had a daughter, Werburga, a most holy virgin.¹ Of these two saints, the mother, [that is to say, St. Ermenhilda,] rests at Ely, where she was abbess after her mother, Sexburga; and the daughter lies at Chester, in the monastery of that city, which Hugh earl of Chester, ejecting a few clerks who resided there in a mean and irregular manner, has recently erected. The praises and miracles of both these women, and particularly of the younger, are there extolled and held in veneration; and though they are favourable to all petitions without delay, yet are they more especially kind and assistant to the supplications of women and youths.

§ 215. Merewald the brother of Wulfer, by Ermenburga, the daughter of Ermenred brother of Ercombent, had two daughters, Mildritha and Milburga. Mildritha, dedicating herself to celibacy, ended her days in the Isle of Thanet in Kent, which king Egbert had given to her mother, to atone for the murder of her brothers, Ethelred and Egelbert.² In after times being transferred to St. Augustine's monastery at Canterbury, she is there honoured by the marked attention of the monks, and celebrated equally for her kindness and affability to all, as her name implies. And although almost every corner of that monastery be filled with the bodies of saints of great name or merit, any one of which would be of itself sufficient to irradiate all England, yet no one is there more revered, more loved, or more gratefully remembered; and she, turning a deaf ear to none who love her, is present to such as have regard to the salvation of their souls.

§ 216. Milburga³ reposes at Wenloc; she was formerly much in estimation by the neighbouring inhabitants; but for some time after the arrival of the Normans, through ignorance of the place of her burial, she was neglected: lately, however, a convent of Culniac monks being established there, while a new church was erecting, a certain boy running violently along the pavement, broke into the hollow of the vault, and discovered the body of the virgin; when a balsamic odour pervading the whole church, she was taken up, and performed so many miracles that the people flocked thither in great multitudes, so that the large-spreading plains could hardly contain the troops of pilgrims, while rich and poor came side by side, one common faith impelling all. Nor did the event deceive their expectations: for no one departed, without either a perfect cure, or considerable abatement of his malady, and some were even healed of the king's evil, by the merits of this virgin, when medical assistance had been unavailing.

§ 217. Edward the Elder, of whom I have before spoken at large,⁴ had by his wife Edgiva,⁵ several daughters. Among these

² In book i. c. 1, it is said the compensation for their murder was made to their mother; but here she is called their sister, which is the general account. When it was left to her to estimate this compensation (i.e. their weregild), she asked as much land as her stog should compass, at one course, in the Isle of Thanet, where she founded the monastery of Minster. was Edburga, who, when scarcely three years old, gave a singular indication of her future sanctity. Her father was inclined to try whether the little girl would lean to God or to the world, and had placed in a chamber the symbols of the different professions; on one side a chalice, and the gospels; on the other, bracelets and necklaces. Hither the child was brought in the arms of her indulgent nurse, and placed on her father's knee; she being desired to choose which she pleased, she rejected the earthly ornaments with angry looks, and falling down before the chalice and the gospels, she adored them with infant adoration. The company present exclaimed aloud, and fondly hailed the omen of the child's future sanctity; her father embraced the infant in a manner still more endearing. "Go," said he, "whither God calls thee; follow with prosperous pace the Spouse whom thou hast chosen, and truly blessed shall my wife and myself be, if we are surpassed in holiness by our daughter." When clothed in the garb of a nun, she gained the affection of all her female companions in the city of Winchester by the marked attention she paid them; nor did the greatness of her birth elevate her; as she esteemed it noble to stoop to the service of Christ. Her sanctity increased with her years, her humility kept pace with her growth; so that she used secretly to steal away the socks of the several nuns at night, and, carefully washing and perfuming them, lay them again upon their beds. Wherefore, though God signalized her while living by many miracles, yet I more particularly bring forward this circumstance, to show that charity began all her works, and humility completed them: and finally, many miracles, both in her lifetime and after her death, confirm the devotion of her heart and the incorruptness of her body, which the attendants at her churches at Winchester and Pershore relate to such as are unacquainted with them.

§ 218. The blessed Edgitha, the daughter of king Edgar, ennobles with her reliques the monastery of Wilton, where she was buried, and cherishes that place with her regard, where, trained from her infancy in the school of the Lord, she gained his favour by unsullied virginity, and constant watchings: repressing the pride of her high birth by her humility. I have heard one circumstance respecting her, from persons of elder days, which greatly staggered the opinions of men: for she led them into false conclusions from the splendour of her costly dress; being always habited in richer garb than the sanctity of her profession seemed to require. On this account, being openly rebuked by St. Ethelwold, she is reported to have answered with equal point and wit, "The judgment of God is true and irrefragable, while that of man alone is fallible; for pride may exist under mean clothing: wherefore I think that a mind may be as pure beneath these vestments as under your tattered furs." The bishop was deeply struck by this speech, admitting its truth by his silence; and reddening with joy that he had been branded by the sparkling repartee of the lady, he held his peace. St. Dunstan had observed her at the consecration of the church of St. Denys, (which she had built out of affection to that martyr,) frequently stretching out her right thumb, and making the sign of the cross upon her forehead ; and being extremely delighted at it, “ May this finger,” he exclaimed, “ never see corruption :” and immediately, while celebrating mass, he burst into such a flood of tears, that he alarmed with his faltering voice an assistant standing near him ; who inquiring the reason of it, “ Soon,” said he, “ shall this blooming rose wither ; soon shall this beloved bird take its flight to God, after the expiration of six weeks from this time.” The truth of the prelate’s prophecy was very shortly fulfilled ; for on the appointed day, this noble, firm-minded lady expired in her prime, at the age of twenty-three years. Soon after, the same saint saw, in a dream, St. Denys kindly taking the virgin by the hand, and strictly enjoining by divine command, that she should be honoured by her servants on earth, in the same manner as she was venerated by her Spouse and Master in heaven. Miracles multiplying at her tomb, it was ordered that her virgin body should be taken up, and placed in a most lofty situation ; when the whole of it was found resolved into dust, except the finger, with the abdomen and parts adjacent : in consequence of which, some debate arising, the virgin herself appeared in a dream to one of those who had seen her remains, saying, “ It was no wonder if the other parts of the body had decayed, since it was customary for dead bodies to moulder to their native dust, and she, perhaps, as a girl, had sinned with those members ; but it was also highly just, that the abdomen should see no corruption which had never felt the sting of lust ; as she had been entirely free from gluttony or carnal copulation.”

§ 219. Truly both these virgins support their respective monasteries by their merits ; each of them being filled with large assemblies of nuns, who answer obediently to the call of their mistresses and patronesses, inviting them to virtue. Happy the man who becomes partaker of those virgin prayers which the Lord Jesus favours with kind regard. For, as I have remarked¹ of the nuns of Shaftesbury, all virtues have long since quitted the earth, and retired to heaven ; or, if any where, (but this I must say with the permission of holy men,) are to be found only in the hearts of nuns ; and surely those women are highly to be praised, who, regardless of the weakness of their sex, vie with each other in the preservation of their continence, and by such means ascend triumphant into heaven.

§ 220. To have been made acquainted with many of the royal family of either sex is, I think, of importance ; as hence may be gathered that king Edward, concerning whom I was speaking before I digressed, had by no means degenerated from the virtues of his ancestors. In fact, he was famed both for miracles and for the spirit of prophecy, as I shall hereafter relate. In the exaction of taxes he was sparing, as he abominated the insolence of collectors : in eating and drinking he was devoid of the addiction to pleasure which his state allowed : on the more solemn festivals, though dressed in robes interwoven with gold, which the queen had most splendidly embroidered, yet still he had such forbearance as to be sufficiently majestic, without being haughty ; considering in such matters rather the bounty of God than the pomp of the world. There was one secular enjoyment in which he chiefly delighted; which was hunting with fleet hounds, whose baying in the woods he used with pleasure to encourage: and again, the flying those birds, whose nature it is to prey on their kindred species. In these exercises, after hearing divine service in the morning, he employed himself whole days. In other respects he was a man by choice devoted to God, and lived the life of an angel in the administration of his kingdom: to the poor and to the stranger, more especially foreigners, and men of religious order, he was kind in invitation, munificent in his presents, and constantly exciting the monks of his own country to imitate their holiness. He was of middle height; his beard and hair swan-white; his countenance florid; fair throughout his whole person; and his form of admirable proportion.

§ 221. The felicity of his times had been revealed in a dream to Brihtwold bishop of Wilton, and he had made it public. For in the time of Cnut, when at Glastonbury, he was once intent on heavenly watchings, and the thought of the near extinction of the royal race of the Angles, which frequently distressed him, came into his mind, sleep stole upon him while he was thus meditating; and behold! rapt on high, he saw Peter, the chief of the apostles, consecrating king Edward, who was then an exile in Normandy; his chaste life too was pointed out, and the exact period of his reign, twenty-four years, determined; and, when inquiring about his posterity, it was answered, "The kingdom of the English belongs to God; after you He will provide a king according to his pleasure."

§ 222. But now to speak of his miracles. A young woman had married an husband of her own age, but having no issue by the union, the humours collecting abundantly about her neck, she had contracted a sore disorder; the glands swelling so that she became a frightful object. Admonished in a dream to have the part affected washed by the king's hands, she entered the palace. The king himself fulfilling this labour of love, rubbed the woman's neck with his fingers dipped in water: a speedy recovery followed his healing hand: the lurid skin opened, so that worms flowing out with the purulent matter, the noxious tumour subsided. But as the orifice of the ulcers was large and unsightly, he commanded her to be supported at the royal expense till she should be perfectly cured; however, before a week was expired, a fair new skin returned, and hid the scars so completely, that nothing of the original wound could be discovered: and within a year becoming the mother of twins, she increased the admiration of Edward's holiness. Those who knew him more intimately, affirm that he often cured this complaint in Normandy: whence appears how false is their notion, who in our times assert, that the cure of this disease does not proceed from personal sanctity, but from hereditary virtue in the royal line.¹

§ 223. A certain man, blind from some unknown mischance, had persisted in asserting about the palace that he should be cured, if he could touch his eyes with the water in which the king's hands had been washed. When this was frequently related to Edward, he derided it, and looked angrily on the persons who mentioned it; saying that he himself was a sinner, and that the works of holy men did not belong to him. But the servants, thinking this a matter not to be neglected, put the man's dream to the proof, unknown to the king, and while he was praying in church. The instant the blind man was washed with the water, the long-enduring darkness fled from his eyes, and they were filled with joyful light, amid the grateful clamour of the by-standers. The king inquiring the cause of the noise was informed of the fact; and when, by thrusting his fingers towards the eyes of the man he had cured, and, perceiving him draw back his head to avoid them, he had made proof of his sight, he, with uplifted hands, returned thanks to God. In the same way he cured a blind man at Lincoln, who survived him many years, a proof of the royal miracle.

§ 224. That you may know the perfect virtue of this prince, in the power of healing more especially, I shall add something which will excite your wonder. Wulfwin, surnamed Spillecorn, the son of Wulmar of Nutgareshale, was one day cutting timber in the wood of Bruelle, and indulging in a long sleep after his labour, lost his sight for seventeen years, from the blood, as I imagine, stagnating about his eyes: at the end of this time, admonished thereto in a dream, he went round to eighty-seven churches, and earnestly entreated a cure of his blindness from the saints. At last coming to the king's court, he remained for a long time, in vain, in opposition to the attendants, at the vestibule of his chamber. He still continued importunate, however, without being deterred, till at last, after much difficulty, he was admitted by order of the king. When he had heard the dream, he mildly answered, "By my lady St. Mary, I shall be truly grateful, if God, through my means, shall choose to take pity upon a wretched creature." In consequence, though he had no confidence in himself with respect to miracles, yet, at the instigation of his servants, he placed his hand, dipped in water, on the blind man; and in a moment the blood dripped plentifully from his eyes, and the man, restored to sight, exclaimed with rapture, "I see you, oh king! I see you, oh king!" Having thus recovered his sight, he had charge of the royal palace at Windsor, (for there the cure had been performed,) for a long time; surviving his restorer several years. On the same day, from the same water, three blind men, and a man with one eye, who were supported on the royal alms, received a cure; the servants administering the healing water with perfect confidence.

§ 225. One holy Easter day, he was sitting at table at Westminster, with the crown on his head, and surrounded by a crowd of nobles. While the rest were greedily eating, and making up for the long fast of Lent by the newly provided viands, he, with mind abstracted from earthly things, was absorbed in the contemplation of some divine matter, when presently he excited the attention of the guests, by bursting into profuse laughter: and as none presumed to inquire into the cause of this joy, he remained silent, as before, until satiety had put an end to the banquet. After the tables were removed, and as he was disrobing in his chamber, three persons of rank followed him; of these earl Harold was one, the second an abbot, and the third a bishop; who presuming on their intimacy, asked the cause of his laughter: observing, that it seemed just matter of astonishment to see him in such perfect tranquillity both of time and occupation, burst into a vulgar laugh, while all others were silent. "I saw something wonderful," said he, "and therefore I did not laugh without a cause." At this, as is the custom of mankind, they began to inquire and search into the matter more earnestly, entreating that he would condescend to disclose it. After much reluctance he yielded to their persevering solicitations, and related the following wonderful circumstance; saying, that the Seven Sleepers in mount Cælius had now lain for two hundred years on their right side; but that at the very hour of his laughter, they turned upon their left: that they would continue to lie in this manner for seventy-four years, which would be a dreadful omen to wretched mortals. For everything would come to pass in these seventy-four years, which the Lord had foretold to his disciples, concerning the end of the world: since nation would rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; earthquakes would be in divers places: pestilence and famine, terrors from heaven, and great signs: changes in kingdoms: wars of the Gentiles against the Christians, and also victories of the Christians over the Pagans. Relating these matters to his wondering audience, he descanted on the passion of these sleepers, and the make of their bodies, though totally unnoticed in history, as readily as though he had lived in daily intercourse with them. On hearing this the earl sent a knight; the bishop, a clergyman; and the abbot, a monk, to Maniches, the Constantinopolitan emperor, to investigate the truth of his declaration; adding letters and presents from the king. After being kindly entertained, Maniches sent them to the bishop of Ephesus, giving them, at the same time, what is called a holy letter, that the martyr-relics of the Seven Sleepers should be shown to the delegates of the king of England.¹ It fell out that the presage of king Edward was proved by all the Greeks; who could swear they had heard from their fathers, that the men were lying on their right side; but after the entrance of the English into the vault, they published the truth of the foreign prophecy to their countrymen. Nor was it long ere the predicted evils came to pass; for the Agarens, and Arabs, and Turks, nations aliens from Christ, making havoc of the Christians, overran Syria, and Lycia, and Asia Minor altogether; many cities too of Asia Major, among which was Ephesus, and even Jerusalem itself. At the same time, on the death of Maniches, emperor of Constantinople, Diogenes and Michaelius, and Bucinacius, and Alexius, in turn hurled each other headlong from the throne; the last of whom, continuing till our time, left for heir his son John,² more noted for cunning and deceit than worth. He contrived many hurtful plots against the pilgrims on their sacred journey; but venerating the fidelity of the English, he showed them every civility, and transmitted his regard for them to his son.¹ In the next seven years three popes, namely, Victor,² Stephen,³ and Nicholas,⁴ diminished the vigour of the papacy by their successive deaths. Almost immediately afterwards, too, died Henry, the pious emperor of the Romans,⁵ and was succeeded by his son Henry, who brought many calamities on the city of Rome by his folly and his wickedness. The same year Henry king of France, a good and active warrior, died by poison.⁶ Soon after, a comet, denoting, as they say, change in kingdoms, appeared trailing its extended and fiery train along the sky: wherefore a certain monk of our monastery, by name Eilmer, bowing down with terror at the sight of the brilliant star, wisely exclaimed, "Thou art come! a matter of lamentation to many a mother art thou come; I have seen thee long since; but I now behold thee much more terrible, threatening to hurl destruction on this country." He was a man of good learning for those times; of mature age; and, in his early youth, had hazarded an attempt of singular temerity: he had by some contrivance fastened wings to his hands and feet, in order that, looking upon the fable as true, he might fly like Dædalus, and collecting the air, on the summit of a tower, had flown for more than the distance of a furlong; but agitated by the violence of the wind and a current of air, as well by the consciousness of his rash attempt, he fell and broke his legs, and was lame ever after. He used to relate as the cause of his failure that he had forgotten to provide himself with a tail.

§ 226. Another prophecy, somewhat like the last, Edward uttered when dying, which I shall here anticipate. When he had lain two days speechless, on the third, sadly and deeply sighing as he awoke from his sleep, "Almighty God," said he, "if this be a real vision, and not a vain illusion which I have seen, grant, but if the contrary, deny, me the power of explaining it to the by-standers." Soon after, speaking fluently, "I saw just now," continued he, "two monks near me, whom formerly, when a youth in Normandy, I knew both to have lived in a most religious manner, and to have died like perfect Christians. These men, announcing themselves as the messengers of God, spake to the following effect: 'Since the chiefs of England, the dukes, bishops, and abbots, are not the ministers of God, but of the devil, God, after your death, has delivered this kingdom for a year and a day into the hand of the enemy, and devils shall wander over all the land.' And when I said that I would show these things to my people, and promised that they should liberate themselves by repentance, after the example of the Ninevites; 'Neither of these,' said they, 'shall take place; for they will not repent, nor will God have mercy on them.' When then, said I, may cessation from such great calamities be hoped for? They reply, 'Whenever a green tree shall be cut through the middle, and the part cut off, being carried the space of three acres from the trunk, shall, without any assistance, become again united to its stem, bud out with flowers, and stretch forth its fruit, as before, from the sap again uniting; then may a cessation of such evils be at last expected.'"

§ 227. Though others were apprehensive of the truth of this prediction, yet Stigand, at that time archbishop, received it with laughter, saying that the old man doted through disease. We, however, find the truth of the presage experimentally; for England is become the residence of foreigners and the property of strangers; at the present time there is no Englishman who is either earl, bishop, or abbot; strangers all, they prey upon the riches and vitals of England; nor is there any hope of a termination to this misery. The cause of which evil, as I have long since promised to narrate, it is now high time that my narrative should endeavour briefly to disclose.

§ 228. King Edward declining into years, as he had no children himself, and saw the sons of Godwin growing in power, despatched messengers to the king of Hungary, to send over Edward, the son of his brother Edmund, with all his family; intending, as he declared, that either he or his sons should succeed to the hereditary kingdom of England, and that his own want of issue should be supplied by that of his kindred. Edward came¹ in consequence, but died almost immediately at St. Paul's in London: he was neither valiant, nor a man of abilities. He left three surviving children; that is to say, Edgar, who, after the death of Harold, was by some elected king; and who, after many revolutions of fortune, is now living wholly retired in the country, in extreme old age; Christina, who grew old at Romsey in the habit of a nun; and Margaret, whom Malcolm king of the Scots espoused. Blessed with a numerous offspring, her sons were Edgar and Alexander, who reigned in Scotland after their father in due succession; for the eldest, Edward,² had fallen in battle with his father; the youngest, David,³ noted for his meekness and discretion, is at present king of Scotland. Her daughters were Matilda, whom in our time king Henry, and Maria, whom Eustace the younger, earl of Boulogne, respectively espoused. The king, in consequence of the death of his relation, losing his first hope of support, gave the succession of England to William earl of Normandy.⁴ He was well worthy of such a gift, being a young man of superior mind, who had raised himself to the highest eminence by his unwearied exertion; moreover, he was his nearest relation by consanguinity, as he was the son of Robert, the son of Richard the second, whom we have repeatedly mentioned as the brother of Emma, Edward's mother. Some affirm¹ that Harold himself was sent into Normandy by the king for this purpose; others,² who knew Harold's more secret intentions, say, that being driven thither against his will, by the violence of the wind, he imagined this device, in order to extricate himself. This, as it appears nearest the truth, I shall relate.³ Harold being at his country seat at Boseham,⁴ went for recreation on board a fishing-boat, and, for the purpose of prolonging his sport, put out to sea; when a sudden tempest arising, he was driven with his companions on the coast of Ponthieu. The people of that district, as was their native custom, immediately assembled from all quarters; and those who were unarmed and few in number, were, as it easily might be, quickly overpowered by an armed multitude, and bound hand and foot. Harold, craftily meditating a remedy for this mischance, sent a person, whom he had allured by very great promises, to William, to say that he had been sent into Normandy by the king, for the purpose of expressly confirming, in person, the message which had been imperfectly delivered by people of less authority; but that he was detained in fetters by Guy earl of Ponthieu, and could not execute his embassy; that it was the barbarous and untamed custom of the country, that such as had escaped destruction at sea, should meet with perils on shore; that it well became a man of his dignity not to let this pass unpunished; that to suffer those to be laden with chains, who appealed to his protection, detracted somewhat from his own greatness; and that if his captivity must be terminated by money, he would gladly give it to earl William, but not to the contemptible Guy. By this means, Harold was liberated at William's command, and conducted to Normandy by Guy in person. The earl entertained him with much respect, both in banqueting and in vesture, according to the custom of his country; and the better to learn his disposition, and at the same time to try his courage, he took him with himself in an expedition which he at that time led against Brittany. There, Harold well approved both in ability and courage, won the heart of the Norman; and, still more to ingratiate himself, he of his own accord, confirmed to him by oath the castle of Dover, which was under his jurisdiction, and the kingdom of England, after the death of Edward. Wherefore, honoured both by having his daughter, then a child, betrothed to him, and by the confirmation of his ample patrimony, he was received into the strictest intimacy. Not long after his return home, the king was crowned⁵ at London on Christmas-day, and being there seized with the disorder of which he was sensible that he should die, he commanded the church of Westminster to be dedicated on Innocents-day.⁶ Thus, full of years and of glory, he surrendered his pure spirit to heaven,¹ and was buried on the day of the Epiphany, in the said church, which he, first in England, had erected after that kind of style which now almost all attempt to rival at enormous expense. The race of the West Saxons, which had reigned in Britain five hundred and seventy-one years, from the time of Cerdic, and two hundred and sixty-one from Egbert, in him ceased altogether to rule. For while the grief for the king's death was yet fresh, Harold, on the very day of the Epiphany, seized the diadem, extorting their consent from the nobles; though the English say, that it was granted him by the king; but I conceive it alleged, more through regard to Harold than through sound judgment, that Edward should transfer his inheritance to a man of whose power he had himself always been jealous: although, not to conceal the truth, Harold would have governed the kingdom with prudence and with courage, in the character he had assumed, had he assumed it lawfully. Indeed, during Edward's lifetime, he had quelled, by his valour, whatever wars were excited against him; wishing to signalize himself with his countrymen, and looking forward with anxious hope to the crown. He first vanquished Griffin king of the Welsh, as I have before related,² in battle; and, afterwards, when he was again making formidable efforts to recover his power, beheaded him, appointing as his successors, two of his own adherents, that is, the brothers of this Griffin, Blegent, and Riwallo, who had obtained his favour by their submission.

The same year Tosti arrived on the Humber, from Flanders, with a fleet of sixty ships, and infested, with piratical depredations, those parts which were adjacent to the mouth of the river; but being quickly driven from the province by the joint force of the brothers, Edwin and Morchar, he set sail towards Scotland; where meeting with Harold Harvagre³ king of Norway, then meditating an attack on England with three hundred ships, he put himself under his command. Both, then, with united forces, laid waste the country beyond the Humber; and falling on the brothers, reposing after their recent victory, and suspecting no attack of the kind, they first routed, and then blockaded them in York. Harold, on hearing this, proceeded thither with all his forces, and, each nation making every possible exertion, a bloody encounter followed; but the English obtaining the advantage, put the Norwegians to flight. Yet, (however reluctantly posterity may believe it,) one single Norwegian for a long time delayed the triumph of so many, and such great men. For standing on the entrance of the bridge, which is called Stantford Brigge,⁴ after having killed several of our party, ne prevented the whole from passing over. Being invited to surrender, with the assurance that a man of such courage should experience the amplest clemency from the English, he derided those who entreated him ; and immediately, with a stern countenance, reproached them as a set of cowards who were unable to resist a single individual. No one approaching nearer, as they thought it unadvisable to come to close-quarters with a man who had desperately rejected every means of safety, one of the king's followers aimed an iron javelin at him from a distance ; transfixed with which as he was boastfully flourishing about, and too incautious from his security, he yielded the victory to the English. The army immediately passing over without opposition, destroyed the dispersed and flying Norwegians. King Harvagre and Tosti were slain ; the king's son,¹ with all the ships, was kindly sent back to his own country. Harold, elated by his successful enterprise, vouchsafed to give no part of the spoil to his soldiers ; on which account many, as they found opportunity, stealing away, deserted the king, as he was proceeding to the battle of Hastings : for with the exception of his stipendiary and mercenary soldiers, he had very few of the people with him.² This was the reason why, circumvented by a stratagem of William's, he was routed, with the army he headed, after possessing the kingdom nine months and some days. The effect of war in this affair was trifling ; it was brought about by the secret and wonderful counsel of God ; since the Angles never again, in any general battle, made a struggle for liberty, as if the whole strength of England had fallen in the person of Harold, who certainly might and deserved to pay the penalty of his perfidy, even though it were by the instrumentality of the most unwarlike people. Nor in saying this, do I at all derogate from the valour of the Normans, to whom I am strongly bound, both by my descent, and for the advantages I enjoy. Still³ those persons appear to me to err, who augment the numbers of the English, and underrate their courage ; for while they thus design to extol the Normans, they in fact degrade them. A mighty commendation indeed ! that a very warlike nation should conquer a set of people who were obstructed by their multitude, and fearful through cowardice ! On the contrary, they were few in number and brave in the extreme ; and who, throwing aside every regard for their personal safety, laid down their lives for their country. But, however, as these matters await a more detailed narrative, I shall now put a period to my second book, that I may return to my composition, and my readers to the perusal of it, with fresh ardour.

³ Will. Pictaviensis, to whom he seems here to allude, asserts that Harold had collected immense forces from all parts of England ; and that Denmark had supplied him with auxiliaries also. But the circumstances mentioned in the preceding note shew the absurdity of this statement.

PREFACE TO BOOK III.

INCITED by different motives, both Normans and English have written of king William : the former have praised him to excess, alike extolling to the utmost his good and his bad actions ; while the latter, out of national hatred, have laden their conqueror with undeserved reproach. For my part, as the blood of each people flows in my veins, I shall steer a middle course ; where I am certified of his good deeds, I shall openly proclaim them ; his bad conduct I shall touch upon lightly and sparingly, though not so as to conceal it ; so that neither shall my narrative be condemned as false, nor will I brand that man with ignominious censure, almost the whole of whose actions may reasonably be excused, if not commended. Wherefore I shall willingly and carefully relate such particulars of him as may be matter of incitement to the indolent, of example to the enterprising, useful to the present age, and pleasing to posterity. But I shall spend little time in relating such things as are of service to no one, and which produce disgust in the reader, as well as ill-will to the author. There are always people, more than sufficient, ready to detract from the actions of the noble : my course of proceeding will be, to extenuate evil, as much as can be done consistently with the sacrifice of truth, and not to bestow excessive commendation even on good actions. For this moderation all true judges will, I imagine, esteem me neither timid nor unskilful. And this rule, too, my history will regard equally, with respect both to William and his two sons ; that nothing shall be dwelt on too fondly, nothing untrue be admitted. The elder of these did little worthy of praise, if we except the early part of his reign ; gaining, throughout the whole of his life, the favour of the military at the expense of the people. The second, more obedient to his father than to his brother, possessed his spirit, unsubdued either by prosperity or adversity : on regarding his warlike expeditions, it is matter of doubt whether he was more cautious or more bold ; on contemplating their event, whether he was more fortunate or unsuccessful. There will be a time, however, when the reader may judge for himself. I am now about to begin my third volume ; and I think I have said enough to make him attentive, and disposed to be instructed ; his own feelings will persuade him to be candid.

THE THIRD BOOK OF WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S

BOOK III.

Of the Arrival of the Normans in England.

§ 229. ROBERT,¹ second son of Richard the Second, after he had, with great glory, held the duchy of Normandy for seven years, resolved on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He had at that time a son, seven years of age, born of a concubine, whose beauty he had accidentally beheld, as she was dancing, and had become so smitten with it as to form a connexion with her; after which he loved her exclusively, and, for some time, regarded her as his wife. He had by her this boy, named after his great-great-grandfather, William, whose future glory was portended to his mother by a dream, wherein she imagined her intestines were stretched out, and extended over the whole of Normandy and England; and at the very moment, also, when the infant burst into life and touched the ground, he filled both hands with the rushes strewed upon the floor, firmly grasping what he had taken up. This prodigy was joyfully witnessed by the women gossiping on the occasion; and the midwife hailed the propitious omen, declaring that the boy would be a king.

§ 230. Every provision being made for the expedition to Jerusalem,¹ the chiefs were summoned to a council at Fescamp, where, at his father's command, all swore fidelity to William: earl Gilbert was appointed his guardian,² and the protection of the earl was assigned to Henry, king of France.³ While Robert was prosecuting his journey, the Normans, each in his several station, united in common in defence of their country, and regarded their infant lord with great affection. This fidelity continued till the report of Robert's death,⁴ which universally gaining ground, their affection changed with his fortune; and then they began severally to fortify their towns, to build castles, to carry in provisions, and to seek the earliest opportunities of revolting from the child.⁵ In the meantime, however,—doubtless by the special aid of God, who had destined him to the sovereignty of such an extended empire,—he grew up uninjured; while Gilbert, almost alone, defended by arms what was just and right; the rest being occupied by the designs of their respective parties. But Gilbert being at this time killed by his cousin Radulph,⁶ fire and slaughter raged on all sides. The country, formerly most flourishing, was now torn with intestine broils, and divided at the pleasure of the plunderers; so that it was justly entitled to complain, “Woe to the land whose king is a child!”⁷ William, however, as soon as his age permitted, receiving the badge of knight-hood from the king of France, inspirited the inhabitants to hope for quiet. The sower of dissension was one Guy, a Burgundian⁸ on his father's side, and grandson to Richard the Second by his daughter. William and Guy had passed their childhood together, and were at that time equally approaching to manhood. Mutual intercourse had produced an intimacy between them which had ripened into friendship. Moreover, thinking, as they were related, that he ought to deny him nothing, he had given him the castles of Brienne and Vernon. The Burgundian,¹ unmindful of this, estranged himself from the earl, feigning sufficient cause of offence to colour his conduct. It would be tedious and useless to relate what actions were performed on either side, what castles were taken; for his perfidy had found abettors in Nigell viscount of Coutances, Ralph viscount of Bayeux,² and Haimo Dentatus,³ grandfather of Robert, who was the occupier of many estates in England in our time. With these persons, this most daring plunderer, allured by vain expectation of succeeding to the earldom, was devastating the whole of Normandy. A sense of duty, however, compelled the guardian-king to succour the desperate circumstances of his ward. Remembering, therefore, the kindness of his father, and that he had, by his influence, exalted him to the kingdom, he rushed on the revolvers at Valdes Dunes:⁴ many thousands of them were there slain, many drowned in the river Orne by its rapidity, while, being hard pressed, they spurred their horses to ford the current. Guy, escaping with difficulty, betook himself to Brienne; but driven thence by William, and unable to endure this disgrace, he retired, of his own accord, to Burgundy, his native soil. Here, too, his unquiet spirit found no rest; for being expelled thence by his brother William,⁵ earl of that province, against whom he had conceived designs, it appears not what fate befel him. Nigell and Ralph were admitted to fealty; Haimo fell in the field of battle, whose remarkable daring is signalized in having unhorsed the king himself; in consequence of which he was slain by the surrounding guards, and in admiration of his valour, honourably buried at the king's command. King Henry received a compensation for this favour, when a Norman lord actively assisted him against Geoffrey Martel, at Herle-Moulin, which is a fortress in the country of Anjou; for William had now attained his manly vigour; an object of dread even to his elders, and though alone, a match for numbers. Unattended he would rush on danger; and when unaccompanied, or with only a few followers, charge into the thickest ranks of the enemy. By this expedition he gained a reputation for admirable bravery, as well as the sincerest regard of the king; so that, with parental affection, he would often admonish him not to hold life in contempt, by encountering danger so precipitately; a life which was the ornament of the French, the safeguard of the Normans, and an example to both.

boastingly taken the surname of Martel,¹ as he seemed, by a certain kind of felicity, to beat down all his opponents. Finally, he had made captive, in open battle, his liege lord the earl of Poitou,² and loading him with chains, had compelled him to accept dishonourable terms of peace: namely, that he should yield up Bourdeaux and the neighbouring cities, and pay an annual tribute for the rest. But he, as it is thought, through the injuries of his confinement and want of food, was, after three days, released from eternal ignominy by a timely death.³ Martel then, that his effrontery might be complete, married the stepmother of the deceased; taking his brothers under his protection until they should be capable of governing the principality. Next entering the territories of Theobald, earl of Blois, he laid siege to the city of Tours; and while he was hastening to the succour of his subjects, made him participate in their afflictions; for being taken and shut up in prison, he ceded the city from himself and his heirs for ever. Who shall dare cry shame on this man's cowardice, who, for the enjoyment of a little longer life, defrauded his successors for ever of the dominion of so great a city? for although we are too apt to be severe judges of others, yet we must know that we should, possibly in like manner, consult our own safety if we were ever to be placed in similar circumstances. In this manner, Martel, insolent from the accession of so much power, obtained possession of the castle of Alençon, even from the earl of Normandy, its inhabitants being faithlessly disposed. Irritated at this outrage, William retaliated, and invested Danfront,⁵ which at that time belonged to the earl of Anjou. Geoffrey, immediately, excited by the complaints of the besieged, hastily rushed forward with a countless force. Hearing of his approach, William sent Roger Montgomery⁶ and William Fitz-Osbern⁷ to reconnoitre. They, from the activity of youth, proceeding many miles in a short time, espied Martel on horseback, and apprised him of the dauntless boldness of their lord. Martel immediately began to rage, to threaten mightily what he would do, and said that he would come thither the next day, and show to the world at large how much an Angevin could excel a Norman in battle; at the same time, with unparalleled insolence, describing the colour of his horse, and the devices on the arms he meant to use. The Norman nobles, with equal vanity relating the same of William, returned and stimulated their party to the conflict. I have described these things minutely for the purpose of displaying the arrogance of Martel. On this occasion, however, he manifested none of his customary magnanimity, retreating without coming to battle; on hearing which, the inhabitants of Alençon surrendered, stipulating for personal safety; and afterwards those of Danfront also listed under the more fortunate standard.¹

people of the fortress called Moulin becoming disaffected, at the instigation of one Walter, went over to the king's side. An active party of soldiers was placed there under the command of Guy, brother of the earl of Poitou, who diligently attended for some time to his military duties; but on hearing the report of the victory at Arques, he stole away into France, and contributed by this means considerably to the glory of the duke.

§ 233. King Henry, however, did not give indulgence to inactivity: but, muttering that his armies had been a laughing-stock to William, immediately collected all his forces, and dividing them into two bodies, he overran the whole of Normandy.¹ He himself headed all the military power which came from that part of Celtic Gaul which lies between the rivers Garonne and Seine; and gave his brother Odo² the command over such as came from that part of Belgic Gaul which is situated between the Rhine and the Seine. In like manner William divided his army with all the skill he possessed, approaching by degrees the camp of the king, which was pitched in the neighbourhood of Evreux, in such a manner as neither to come to close engagement, nor yet suffer the province to be devastated in his presence. His generals were Robert, earl of Auch, Hugo de Gournay, Hugo de Montfort, and William Crispin, who opposed Odo at a town called Mortemer.³ Nor did the other, relying on the numerous army which he commanded, at all delay coming to action; yet making only slight resistance at the beginning, and afterwards being unable to withstand the attack of the Normans, he retreated, and was himself the first to fly: and there, while Guy, earl of Ponthieu, was anxiously endeavouring to revenge his brother, he was made captive, and felt, together with many others of surpassing affluence and rank, the weight of that hand which was so fatal to his family. When William was informed of this success by messengers, he took care that it should be proclaimed in the dead of night near the king's tent; on hearing which he retired, after some days spent in Normandy, into France; and soon after, ambassadors passing between them, it was concluded by treaty that the king's partizans should be set at liberty, and that the earl should become legally possessed of all that had been, or should hereafter be, taken from Martel.

§ 234. It would be both tedious and useless to relate their perpetual contentions, or how William always came off conqueror. What shall we say besides, when, through magnanimity, despising the custom of modern times, he never condescended to attack him suddenly, or without acquainting him of the day. Moreover, I pass by the circumstance of king Henry's again violating his friendship; his entering Normandy,⁴ and proceeding through the district of Hiesmes⁵ to the river Dive, boasting that the sea was the sole obstacle to his farther progress. But William now perceiving himself reduced to extremities by the king's perfidy, at length brandished the arms of conscious valour, and defeated the royal forces which were beyond the river,—for part of them hearing of his arrival had passed over some little time before,—with such entire loss, that henceforth France feared nothing so much as to irritate the ferocity of the Normans. The death of Henry¹ soon following, and, shortly after, that of Martel,² put an end to these broils. The dying king entrusted the care of his son Philip, at that time extremely young, to Baldwin earl of Flanders. He was a man equally celebrated for fidelity and wisdom; in the full possession of bodily strength, and also ennobled by a marriage with the king's sister: his daughter Matilda, a woman who was a singular mirror of prudence in our time, and the perfection of virtue, had been already married to William. Hence it arose, that being mediator between his ward, and his son-in-law, Baldwin restrained, by his wholesome counsels, the feuds of the chiefs, and of the people.

§ 235. But since mention has been so often made of Martel, I shall briefly trace the genealogy of the earls of Anjou,³ as far as the knowledge of my informant reaches, apologizing as usual for the digression. Fulco the elder,⁴ presiding over that country for many years, even to advanced age, performed many great and prudent actions. There is only one thing for which I have heard him branded: for, having induced Herbert earl of Maine to come to Saintes, under the promise of yielding him that city, he caused him, in the midst of their conversation, to be surrounded by his attendants, and compelled him to submit to his own conditions: in other respects he was of irreproachable integrity. In his latter days, he ceded his principality to Geoffrey his son,⁵ so often mentioned. Geoffrey conducted himself with excessive barbarity to the inhabitants, and with equal haughtiness even to the person who had conferred this honour upon him: on which account, being ordered by his father to lay down the government and ensigns of authority, he was arrogant enough to take up arms against him. The blood of the old man, though grown cold and languid, yet boiled with indignation; and in the course of a few days, by adopting wiser counsels, he so brought down the proud spirit of his son, that after carrying his saddle on his back⁶ for some miles, he cast himself with

⁶ To carry a saddle was a punishment of extreme ignominy for certain crimes. his burthen at his father's feet. He, fired once more with his ancient courage, rising up and spurning the prostrate youth with his foot, exclaimed, "You are conquered at last! you are conquered!" repeating his words several times. The suppliant had still spirit enough to make this admirable reply, "I am conquered by you alone, because you are my father; by others I am utterly invincible." With this speech his irritated mind was mollified, and having consoled the mortification of his son by paternal affection, he restored him to the principality, with admonitions to conduct himself more wisely: telling him that the prosperity and tranquillity of the inhabitants of the district were creditable to him abroad, as well as advantageous at home. In the same year the old man, having discharged all secular concerns, and making provision for his soul, proceeded to Jerusalem, where compelling two servants by an oath to do whatever he commanded, he was by them publicly dragged, naked, in the sight of the Turks, to the Holy Sepulchre. One of them twisted a rope about his neck, the other with a rod scourged his bare back, whilst he cried out, "Lord, receive the wretched Fulco, thy perfidious, thy deserter: regard my repentant soul, O Lord Jesus Christ." His prayer was not then granted; but, peacefully returning home, he died¹ some few years after. The precipitate boldness of his son Geoffrey has been amply displayed in the preceding pages. He dying,² bequeathed his inheritance to Geoffrey, his sister's son,³ but his worldly wisdom he could not leave him: for being a youth of simple manners, and more accustomed to pray in church than to handle arms, he excited the contempt of the people of that country, who knew not how to live in quiet. In consequence, the whole district becoming exposed to plunderers, Fulco, his brother, of his own accord, seized on the duchy. Fulco was called Rechin,⁴ from his perpetual growling at the simplicity of his brother, whom he finally despoiled of his dignity, and kept in continual custody: he had a wife,⁵ who, being enticed by the lust of an higher title, deserted him and married Philip king of France; who so desperately loved her, regardless of the adage,

"Majesty and love
But ill accord, nor share the selfsame seat," that he patiently suffered himself to be completely governed by her, though he was at the same time desirous of ruling over every other person. Lastly, merely through regard for her, he suffered himself for some years to be pointed at like an idiot, and to be excommunicated⁶ from the whole Christian world. The sons of Fulco were Geoffrey and Fulco. Geoffrey obtaining the hereditary surname of Martel, ennobled it by his exertions; procuring such peace and tranquillity in those parts, as no one ever had seen, or will see in future. On this account being killed by the treachery of his people, he forfeited the credit of his consummate worth. Fulco succeeding to the government, is yet living;¹ and as I shall perhaps have occasion to speak of him in the times of king Henry, I will now proceed to relate what remains concerning William.

§ 236. When, after much labour, he had quelled all civil dissension, he meditated an exploit of greater fame, and determined to recover those countries anciently attached to Normandy,² though now disunited by long custom. I allude to the counties of Maine and Brittany; of which Mans, long since burnt by Martel and deprived of its sovereign Hugh, had lately experienced some little respite under Herbert the son of Hugh; who, with a view to greater security against the earl of Anjou, had submitted, and sworn fidelity to William; besides, he had solicited his daughter in marriage, and had been betrothed to her, though he died by disease ere she was marriageable. He left William his heir, adjuring his subjects to admit no other; telling them they might have, if they chose, a mild and honourable lord; but, should they not, a most determined assertor of his right. On his decease, the inhabitants of Maine rather inclined to Walter of Mantes, who had married Hugh's sister; but at length, being brought to their senses by many heavy losses, they acknowledged William. This was the time, when Harold was unwillingly carried to Normandy by an unpropitious gale; whom, as is before mentioned,³ William took with him in his expedition to Brittany, to make proof of his prowess, and, at the same time, with the deeper design of showing to him his military equipment, that he might perceive how far preferable was the Norman sword to the English battle-axe. Alan, at that time, earl of Brittany, flourishing in youth, and of transcendent strength, had overcome his uncle Eudo, and performed many famous actions; and so far from fearing William, had even voluntarily irritated him. But he, laying claim to Brittany as his hereditary territory, because Charles had given it with his daughter, Gisla, to Rollo, shortly acted in such wise, that Alan came suppliantly to him, and surrendered himself and his possessions. And since I shall have but little to say of Brittany hereafter, I will here briefly insert an extraordinary occurrence, which happened about that time in the city of Nantes.

§ 237. There were in that city two clerks, priests, though not yet of legal age, which office they had obtained from the bishop of that pace, more by entreaty than desert; the pitiable death of one of whom, at length taught the survivor how near they had before been to the brink of hell. As to their knowledge of literature, they were so instructed, that they wanted little of perfection; from their earliest infancy, they had in such wise vied in offices of friendship, that according to the expression of the comic writer,¹ "To serve each other they would not only stir hand and foot, but even risk the loss of life itself." Wherefore, one day, when they found their minds more than usually free from outward cares, they spoke their sentiments, in a secret place, to the following effect:—"That for many years they had given their attention sometimes to literature, and sometimes to worldly gain; nor had they satisfied their minds, which had been occupied rather in wrong, than proper pursuits; that in the meanwhile that bitter day was insensibly approaching, which would burst the bond of union which was indissoluble while life remained; wherefore they should provide in time, that the friendship which united them while living should accompany him who died first to the place of the dead." They agreed, therefore, that whoever of the two should first depart, should certainly appear to the survivor, whether waking or sleeping, if possible within thirty days, to inform him that, according to the Platonic tenet, death does not extinguish the spirit, but sends it back again, as it were from prison, to God its Author: but if this did not take place, then they must agree with the sect of the Epicureans, who hold that the soul, liberated from the body, vanishes into air, or mingles with the wind. Mutually plighting their faith, they repeated their oath in their daily conversation.

² "In the year 991, the Bretons who inhabited the town of Gaul, rising against the Normans, to whom they were subjected, were subdued by William Long-espée," Ex libello Hugonis Floriacensis Monachi, ap. Bouquet, xi. 181, note ^a.

A short time elapsed, and behold a sudden and a violent death deprived one of them of mortal existence. The other remained, and seriously revolving the promise of his friend, and constantly expecting his presence, during thirty days, found his hopes disappointed. At the expiration of this time, when, despairing of seeing him, he had occupied his leisure in other business, the deceased, with that pale countenance which dying persons assume, suddenly stood before him, when he was awake, and busied on some matter. The dead first addressing the living man, who was silent:—"Do you know me?" said he; "I do," replied the other; "nor am I so much disturbed at your unusual presence, as I wonder at your continued absence." But when he had excused the tardiness of his appearance, he said, "At length, having overcome every impediment, I am present; which presence, if you please, my friend, will be advantageous to you, but to me totally unprofitable; for I am doomed, by a sentence which has been pronounced and ratified, to eternal punishment." When the living man promised to give all his property to monasteries, and to the poor, and to spend days and nights in fasting and prayer, for the release of the defunct; he replied, "What I have said is fixed; for the judgments of God, by which I am plunged in the sulphureous whirlpool of hell, are without repentance. There I shall be tossed for my crimes, 'as long as the pole whirls round the stars, or ocean beats the shores ;' the rigour of this irreversible sentence remains for ever, devising lasting and innumerable kinds of punishment, although the whole world should seek for availing remedies ! And that you may experience some little of my numberless pains, here," said he, stretching out his hand, dripping with a corrupted ulcer, "is one of the very smallest of them ; does it appear trifling to you ?" When the other replied that it did appear so, bending his fingers into the palm, he threw three drops of the purulent matter upon him ; two of which touching his temples, and one his forehead, they penetrated the skin and flesh, as if with a burning cautery, and made holes of the size of a nut. Acknowledging the acuteness of the pain by the cry he uttered, "This," said the dead man, "will be a strong proof to you, as long as you live, of my pains ; and, unless you neglect it, a singular warning for your own salvation. Wherefore, while you have the power, while wrath is suspended over your head, while God's lingering mercy waits for you, change your habit, change your disposition, become a monk at Rennes, in the monastery of St. Melanius." When the living man was unwilling to agree to these words, the other, sternly glancing at him, "If you doubt, wretched man," said he, "turn and read these letters ;" and with these words, he stretched out his hand, inscribed with black characters, in which Satan, and all the company of infernals sent their thanks, from hell, to the whole ecclesiastical body ; as well for denying themselves no single pleasure, as for sending, through neglect of their preaching, more of their subject souls to hell, than any former age had ever witnessed. With these words the shade of the speaker vanished ; and the hearer, distributing his whole property to the church and to the poor, went to the monastery of St. Melanius ; admonishing all, who heard or saw him, of his sudden conversion, and extraordinary intercourse, so that they exclaimed, "This is a change of the right hand of the most High."

§ 238. I feel no regret at having inserted this for the benefit of my readers ; now I shall return to William. For since I have briefly, but I hope not uselessly, gone over the transactions in which he was engaged when only earl of Normandy, for thirty years, the order of time now requires a change in the narrative ; that I may, as far as my inquiries have discovered, detect that is false, and declare the truth relating to his regal government.

When king Edward died, England, fluctuating with doubtful favour, was uncertain to which ruler she should commit herself ; to Harold, William, or Edgar ; for the king had recommended him also to the nobility, as nearest to the sovereignty in point of birth ; concealing his better judgment from the tenderness of his disposition. Wherefore, as I have said above, the English were distracted in their choice, although all of them openly wished well to Harold. He, indeed, when once dignified with the diadem, thought nothing of the covenant betwixt himself and William ; but he said that he was absolved from his oath, because his daughter, to whom he had been betrothed, had died ere she was marriageable. For this man, though possessing numberless good qualities, is reported to have been careless about abstaining from breach of trust, if he might, by any device whatever, elude the reasonings of men on this matter; moreover, he supposed that the threats of William would never be put into execution, because the latter was occupied in wars with neighbouring princes, and so he and his subjects gave full indulgence to their fancied security; and indeed, had he not heard that the king of Norway was approaching, he would neither have condescended to collect troops, nor to array them. William, in the meantime, began mildly to address him by messengers, to expostulate on the broken covenant, to mingle threats with entreaties, and to warn him, that ere a year expired, he would claim his due by the sword, and that he would come to that very place where Harold supposed he had firmer footing than himself. Harold again rejoined what I have related,¹ concerning the nuptials of his daughter, and added that he had been presumptuous on the subject of the kingdom, in having confirmed to him by oath another's right, without the universal consent and edict of the council, and of the people; again, that a rash oath ought to be broken; for if the oath, or vow, which a maiden, under her father's roof, made concerning her person, without the knowledge of her parents, were adjudged invalid; how much more invalid must that oath be, which he had made concerning the whole kingdom, when he was himself only a subject under the king's authority, and compelled by the necessity of the time, and without the knowledge of the nation:² besides it was an unjust request to ask him to resign a government which he had assumed by the universal kindness of his fellow subjects; a thing which would neither be agreeable to the people nor safe for the military.

In this way, confounded either by true or plausible arguments, the messengers returned without success. The earl, however, made every necessary preparation for war during the whole of that year; retained his own soldiers with increased pay, and invited those of others; ordered his ranks and battalions in such wise, that the soldiers should be tall and stout; that the commanders and standard-bearers, in addition to their military science, should be looked up to for their wisdom and age; insomuch, that each of them, whether seen in the field or elsewhere, might be taken for a prince rather than a leader. The bishops and abbots of those days vied so much in piety, and the nobility in princely liberality, that it is wonderful,³ how within so very few years nearly all the attributes of either order should have become so changed : the former, in some things more sluggish, but in general more liberal ; and the latter more prudent in every thing but more penurious ; yet both, in defending their country, valiant in battle, prudent in counsel ; prompt to advance their own fortune, and depress that of their enemies. But at that time the energy of William, seconded by the providence of God, already anticipated the invasion of England ; and that no rashness might stain his just cause, he sent to the pope, formerly Anselm, bishop of Lucca, but who had assumed the name of Alexander,¹ alleging the justice of the war he meditated with all the eloquence of which he was master. Harold omitted to do this, either because he was proud by nature, or else distrusted his cause ; or because he feared that his messengers would be obstructed by William and his partisans, who beset every port. The pope duly examining the pretensions of both parties, delivered a standard to William, as an auspicious presage of the kingdom ; on receiving which he summoned an assembly of his nobles at Lillebon, for the purpose of ascertaining their sentiments on this attempt. And when he had encouraged, by splendid promises, all who approved his design, he ordered them to prepare shipping, in proportion to the extent of their possessions. Thus they departed at that time, and in the month of August reassembled in a body at St. Valery, for so that port is called by its new name.² Collecting, therefore, ships from every quarter, they awaited the propitious gale which was to carry them to the place of their destination. When this delayed blowing for several days, the common soldiers, as is generally the case, began to mutter in their tents, that the man must be mad, who wished to subjugate a foreign country ; that, God opposed him, for He withheld the wind ; that, his father purposed a similar attempt, and was in like manner frustrated ; that, it was the fate of that family to aspire to things beyond their reach, and find that God was their adversary. In consequence of these things, which were enough to enervate the force of the brave, being publicly noised abroad, the duke held a council with his chiefs, and ordered the body of St. Valery to be brought forth, and to be exposed to the open air, for the purpose of imploring a wind. No delay now interposed, but the wished-for gale filled their sails. A joyful shout then arising, summoned every one to the ships. The earl himself first launching³ from the continent into the deep, awaited the rest, at anchor nearly in mid-channel. All then assembled round the crimson sail of the admiral's ship, and, having first dined, they arrived, after a favourable passage, at Hastings. As he disembarked he slipped down, but turned the accident to his advantage; a soldier who stood near calling out to him, "You hold England,¹ my lord, its future king." He then restrained his whole army from plundering; warning them that they should now abstain from what must hereafter be their own;² and for fifteen successive days he remained so perfectly quiet that he seemed to think of nothing less than of war.

² These words seem to imply that the Great Council of the kingdom had never agreed to any settlement of the crown on the duke; and without such sanction no oath made by Harold in favour of William would have been binding.

§ 239. In the meantime Harold returned from the battle which he had waged against the Norwegians, happy in his own estimation, at having conquered; but not so in mine, as he had secured the victory by parricide.³ When the news of the Norman's arrival reached him, reeking as he was from battle, he proceeded to Hastings, though accompanied by very few forces. No doubt the fates urged him on, as he neither summoned his troops, nor had he been willing to do so would he have found many ready to obey his call, so hostile were all to him, as I have before observed,⁴ from his having appropriated the northern spoils entirely to himself. He sent out some persons, however, to reconnoitre the number and strength of the enemy: these, being taken within the camp, William ordered to be led amongst the tents, and after feasting them plentifully, to be sent back uninjured to their lord. On their return, Harold inquired what news they brought; when, after relating at full the noble confidence of the general, they gravely added, that almost all his army had the appearance of priests; as they had the whole face with both lips shaven; for the English⁵ leave the upper lip unshorn, suffering the hair continually to increase, which Julius Cæsar, in his treatise on the Gallic War,⁶ affirms to have been a national custom with the ancient inhabitants of Britain. The king smiled at the simplicity of the relators, observing, with a

⁵ This national distinction between the English and the Normans is carefully observed in the Bayeux Tapestry.

pleasant laugh, that they were not priests, but soldiers, strong in arms and invincible in spirit. His brother Gurth,¹ a youth on the verge of manhood, and of knowledge and valour surpassing his years, caught up his words: "Since," said he, "you extol so much the valour of the Norman, I think it ill-advised for you, who are his inferior in strength and desert, to contend with him. Nor can you deny that you are bound to him by oath, either willingly or by compulsion: wherefore you will act wisely, if, yourself withdrawing from this pressing emergency, you allow us to try the issue of a battle; we, who are free from all obligation, shall justly draw the sword in defence of our country. It is to be apprehended if you engage, that you will be either subjected to flight or to death; whereas, if we only fight, your cause will be safe at all events; for you will be able both to rally the fugitives and to avenge the dead."

§ 240. His unbridled rashness yielded no placid ear to the words of his adviser, thinking it base, and a reproach to his past life, to turn his back on danger of any kind; and, with similar impudence, or to speak more favourably, imprudence, he drove away a monk, the messenger of William, not deigning him even a complacent look; imprecating only, that God would decide between him and the earl. He was the bearer of three propositions: either that Harold would relinquish the kingdom, according to his agreement; or hold it of William; or decide the matter by single combat, in the sight of either army. For William² claimed the kingdom on the ground that king Edward, by the advice of Stigand the archbishop, and of the earls Godwin and Siward, had granted it to him, and had sent the son and nephew of Godwin to Normandy, as sureties of the grant. If Harold should deny this, he would abide by the judgment of the pope, or by battle: on all which propositions, the messenger being frustrated by the single answer I have related, returned, and communicated to his party fresh spirit for the conflict.

§ 241. The courageous leaders mutually prepared for battle, each according to his national custom. The English, as we have heard, passed the night without sleep, in drinking and singing, and in the morning proceeded without delay towards the enemy; all on foot, armed with battle-axes and covering themselves in front by the junction of their shields, they formed an impenetrable body, which would have secured their safety that day, had not the Normans, by a feigned flight, induced them to open their ranks, till that time, according to their custom, closely compacted. The king himself on foot, stood, with his brothers, near the standard; in order that while all shared equal danger, none could think of retreating. This standard

² This is from W. Pictaviensis, who puts it in the mouth of the Conqueror, but it is evidently false, for Godwin died A. D. 1053, Siward A. D. 1055, and in 1054 we find Edward the Confessor sending for his nephew from Hungary, to make him his successor in the kingdom, who accordingly arrived in A. D. 1057, and died almost immediately after. He could not, therefore, have made the settlement as here asserted. And see Malmesbury's Gesta Pontificum, f. 116 b.

William sent, after the victory, to the pope; it was sumptuously embroidered with gold and precious stones, and represented the form of a man fighting.

§ 242. On the other hand, the Normans passed the whole night in confessing their sins, and received the communion of the Lord's Body in the morning; their infantry, with bows and arrows, formed the vanguard, while their cavalry, divided into wings, were thrown back. The earl, with serene countenance, declaring aloud that God would favour his, as being the righteous side, called for his arms; and presently, when through the hurry of his attendants, he had put on his hauberk the hind part before,¹ he corrected the mistake with a laugh, saying, "The power of my dukedom shall be turned into a kingdom." Then beginning the song of Roland,² that the warlike example of that man might stimulate the soldiers; and calling on God for assistance, the battle commenced on both sides, and was fought with great ardour, neither side giving ground during the greater part of the day. Finding this, William gave a signal to his party, that, by a feigned flight, they should retreat. Through this device, the close body of the English, opening for the purpose of cutting down the straggling enemy, brought upon itself swift destruction; for the Normans, facing about, attacked them thus disordered, and compelled them to fly. In this manner, deceived by a stratagem, they met an honourable death in avenging their country; nor indeed were they at all without their own revenge, for by frequently making a stand, they slaughtered their pursuers in heaps. Getting possession of an eminence, they drove down the Normans, when roused with indignation and anxiously striving to gain the higher ground, into the valley beneath, where, easily hurling their javelins and rolling down stones on them as they stood below, they destroyed them to a man. Besides, by a short passage with which they were acquainted, avoiding a deep ditch, they trod under foot such a multitude of their enemies in that place, that they made the hollow level with the plain, by the heaps of carcasses. This vicissitude of first one party conquering, and then the other, prevailed as long as the life of Harold continued; but when he fell, from having his brain pierced with an arrow, the flight of the English ceased not until night. The valour of both leaders was here eminently conspicuous.

§ 243. Harold, not merely content with the duty of a general in exhorting others, diligently entered into every soldier-like duty; often would he strike the enemy when coming to close quarters, so that none could approach him with impunity; for immediately the same blow levelled both horse and rider. Wherefore, as I have related, receiving the fatal arrow from a distance, he yielded to death. One of the soldiers with a sword gashed his thigh, as he lay prostrate; for which shameful and cowardly action he was branded with ignominy by William, and expelled from the army.

² What this was is not known, but it is supposed to have been a ballad or romance commemorating the heroic achievements of the Paladin Roland and other peers of Charlemagne, who fell at Roncevaux. Rivet (Histoire littéraire de la France, vii. 72,) infers from this passage that la langue Romane was in use at that period.

§ 244. William, too, was equally ready to encourage his soldiers by his voice and by his presence; to be the first to rush forward; to attack the thickest of the foe. Thus everywhere raging, everywhere furious, he lost three chosen horses, which were that day killed under him. The dauntless spirit and vigour of the intrepid general, however, still persisted, though often called back by the kind remonstrance of his body-guard; he still persisted, I say, till approaching night crowned him with complete victory. And no doubt the hand of God so protected him, that the enemy should draw no blood from his person, though they aimed so many javelins at him.

§ 245. This was a fatal day to England, a melancholy havoc of our dear country, in the struggle for the change of its new lords. For it had long since adopted the manners of the Angles, which had been very various, according to the times; for in the first years of their arrival, they were barbarians in their look and manners, warlike in their usages, heathens in their rites; but after embracing the faith of Christ, by degrees, and in process of time, in consequence of the peace which they enjoyed, they regarded arms only in a secondary light, and they gave their whole attention to religion. I say nothing of the poor, the meanness of whose fortune often restrains them from overstepping the bounds of justice; I omit men of ecclesiastical rank, whom sometimes respect for their profession, and sometimes the fear of shame, suffers not to deviate from the true path: I speak of princes, who from the greatness of their power might have full liberty to indulge in pleasure; some of whom in their own country, and others at Rome, changing their habit, obtained an heavenly kingdom, and a saintly intercourse; and many during their whole lives, in outward appearance, devoted themselves to worldly affairs, in order that they might exhaust their treasures on the poor, or divide them amongst monasteries. What shall I say of the multitudes of bishops, hermits, and abbots? Does not the whole island blaze with such numerous reliques of its natives, that you can scarcely pass a village of any consequence but you hear the name of some new saint? And of how many have all notices perished through the want of records? Nevertheless, in process of time, the desire after literature and religion had decayed for several years before the arrival of the Normans. The clergy, contented with a very slight degree of learning, could scarcely stammer out the words of the sacraments; and a person who understood grammar was an object of wonder and astonishment.¹ The monks mocked the rule of their order by fine vestments, and the use of every kind of food. The nobility, given up to luxury and wantonness, went not to church in the morning after the manner of Christians, but merely, in a careless manner, heard matins and masses from a hurrying priest in their chambers, amid the blandishments of their wives. The commonalty, left unprotected, became a prey to the most powerful, who amassed fortunes, by either seizing on their property or by selling their persons into foreign countries; although it is characteristic of this people to be more inclined to revelling than to the accumulation of wealth. There was one custom repugnant to nature, which they adopted; namely to sell their female servants, when pregnant by them, and after they had satisfied their lust, either to public prostitution or foreign slavery. Drinking in parties was an universal practice, in which occupation they passed entire nights as well as days.¹ They consumed their whole substance in mean and despicable houses; unlike the Normans and French, who, in noble and splendid mansions, live with frugality. The vices attendant on drunkenness, which enervate the human mind, followed; hence it arose that when they engaged William, more with rashness and precipitate fury than military skill, they doomed themselves and their country to slavery, by one, and that an easy victory. For nothing is less effective than rashness; and what begins with violence, quickly ceases, or is repelled. In fine, the English² at that time wore short garments, reaching to the mid-knee; they had their hair cropped, their beards shaven, their arms laden with golden bracelets, their skin adorned with punctured designs; they were accustomed to eat till they became surfeited, and to drink till they were sick. These latter qualities they imparted to their conquerors; as to the rest, they adopted their manners. I would not, however, have these bad propensities ascribed to the English universally: I know that many of the clergy, at that day, trod the path of sanctity, by a blameless life; I know that many of the laity, of all ranks and conditions, in this nation, were well-pleasing to God. Be injustice far from this account; the accusation does not involve the whole, indiscriminately: but, as in peace, the mercy of God often cherishes the bad and the good together; so, equally, does His severity sometimes include them both in captivity.

§ 246. The Normans,—that I may speak of them also,—were at that time, and are even now, exceedingly particular in their dress and delicate in their food, but not so to excess. They are a race inured to war, and can hardly live without it, fierce in rushing against the enemy, and, where force fails of success, ready to use stratagem, or to corrupt by bribery. As I have said,³ they live in large edifices with economy, envy their equals, wish to excel their superiors, and plunder their subjects, though they defend them from others ; they are faithful to their lords, though a slight offence renders them perfidious. They weigh treachery by its chance of success, and change their sentiments with money. The politest, however, of all nations, they esteem strangers worthy of equal honour with themselves : they also intermarry with their vassals. They revived, by their arrival, the rule of religion¹ which had everywhere grown lifeless in England. You might see churches rise in every village, and monasteries in the towns and cities, built after a style unknown before ; you might behold the country flourishing with renovated rites ; so that each wealthy man accounted that day lost to him, which he had neglected to signalize by some magnificent action. But having enlarged sufficiently on these points, let us pursue the operations of William.

³ See § 245.

How William was acknowledged by the English.

§ 247. When his victory was complete, he caused his dead to be interred with great pomp, granting the enemy the liberty of doing the like, if they thought proper. He sent the body of Harold to his mother, (who begged it,) unransomed, though she proffered large sums by her messengers. She buried it, when thus obtained, at Waltham ;² a church he had built at his own expense, in honour of the Holy Cross, and which he had filled with canons. William then, by degrees proceeding, (as became a conqueror,) with his army, not after an hostile but a royal manner, journeyed towards London, the principal city of the kingdom ; and shortly after all the citizens came out to meet him with gratulations. Crowds poured out of every gate to greet him, instigated by the nobility, and principally by Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, and Aldred of York. For, shortly before, Edwin and Morcard, two brothers of great expectation, hearing at London the news of Harold's death, solicited the citizens to raise one of them to the throne ; failing, however, in the attempt, they had departed for Northumberland, conjecturing by a surmise of their own that William would never come thither. The other chiefs would have chosen Edgar, had the bishops supported them ; but, danger and domestic broils closely impending, neither did this take effect. Thus the English, who, had they been united in one resolution, might have repaired the ruin of their country, introduced a stranger, while they were unwilling to choose a native, to govern them. Being now decidedly hailed king, he was crowned on Christmas day by archbishop Aldred;¹ for he was careful not to accept this office from Stigand, as he was not canonically an archbishop.

² There seems to have been a fabulous story current during the twelfth century that Harold escaped from the battle of Hastings. Giraldus Cambrensis asserts that it was believed Harold had fled from the battle-field pierced with many wounds, and with the loss of his left eye, and that he ended his days piously and virtuously as an anchorite at Chester. Both Knighton and Brompton quote this story. W. Pictaviensis says that William refused the body to his mother, who offered its weight in gold for it, ordering it to be buried on the sea-coast. In the Harleian MS. 3776, before referred to, Gurth, Harold's brother, is said to have escaped alive : he is represented in his interview with Henry the Second to have spoken mysteriously respecting Harold, and to have declared that the body of that prince was not at Waltham. Sir Henry Ellis, quoting this MS. justly observes that the whole was, probably, the fabrication of one of the secular canons, who were ejected at the re-foundation of Waltham abbey in 1177.

Summary of William's military Transactions in England.

§ 248. Of the various wars which he carried on, this is a summary. Favoured by God's assistance, he easily reduced the city of Exeter,² when in a state of rebellion; for part of the wall fell down accidentally, and made an opening for him. Indeed he had attacked it with the more ferocity, asserting that those irreverent men would be deserted by God's favour, because one of them, standing upon the wall, had bared his posteriors, and had broken wind, in contempt of the Normans. He almost annihilated the city of York,³ that sole remaining shelter for rebellion, destroying its citizens with sword and famine. For there Malcolm, king of the Scots, with his party, there Edgar, and Marcher, and Weldeof, with the English and Danes, often brooded over the nest of tyranny; there they frequently killed his generals; whose deaths were I severally to commemorate, perhaps I should not be out of order, though I might risk the peril of creating disgust; while I should be not easily pardoned as an historian, if I were led astray by the falsities of my authorities.

How William took York, and laid waste the whole Province.

§ 249. Malcolm willingly received all the English fugitives, affording to each every protection in his power, but more especially to Edgar, whose sister he had married out of regard to her noble descent. On his behalf he infested the adjacent provinces of England with plunder and fire; not that he supposed by so doing he could be of any service to him with respect to the kingdom, but merely to annoy William, who was incensed that his territories were subject to Scottish incursions. In consequence, William, collecting a body of foot and horse, repaired to the northern parts of the island, and first of all received into subjection the metropolitan city, which the English, Danes, and Scots obstinately defended; its citizens being wasted with continued want. He destroyed also in a great and severe battle a considerable number of the enemy, who had come to the succour of the besieged; though the victory was not bloodless on his side, as he lost many of his people. He then ordered both the towns and fields of the whole district to be laid waste;¹ the fruits and grain to be destroyed by fire or by water, more especially on the coast, as well on account of his recent displeasure, as because a rumour had gone abroad, that Cnut, king of Denmark, the son of Swane, was approaching with his forces. The reason of such a command was, that the plundering pirate should find no booty on the coast to carry off with him, if he designed to depart again directly; or should be compelled to provide against want, if he thought proper to stay. Thus the resources of a province, once flourishing, and the nurse of tyrants, were cut off by fire, slaughter, and devastation; the ground, for more than sixty miles, totally uncultivated and unproductive, remains bare even to the present day. Should any stranger now see it, he laments over the once magnificent cities! the towers threatening heaven itself with their loftiness; the fields abundant in pasturage and watered with rivers: and, if any ancient inhabitant remains, he knows it no longer.

² It may be observed that, with the exception of the MS. used by Savile, all the MSS. agree in reading Exeter; but Matthew Paris, who has followed Malmesbury, seems to have written Oxford instead of Exeter; the best MSS. of Matthew Paris (MS. Reg. 14, C. vii. and MS. Cott. Nero, D. v.) reading Oxford. Upon a passage in the Domesday Survey describing Oxford as containing four hundred and seventy-eight houses which were so desolated that they could not pay geld, Sir Henry Ellis remarks: "The extraordinary number of houses specified as desolated at Oxford requires explanation. If the passage is correct, Matthew Paris, who here copies Malmesbury, probably gives us the cause of it, under the year 1067, when William the Conqueror subdued Oxford, in his way to York. Matt. Par. sub ann. 1067 The siege of Exeter in 1067 is also mentioned by Simeon of Durham, col. 197; Hoveden, col. 258; Ralph de Diceto, col. 482; Florence of Worcester, fol. Francof. 1601, p. 635; and by Ordericus Vitalis, p. 510.

Account of Malcolm, King of the Scots.

§ 250. Malcolm surrendered himself, without coming to an engagement, and for the whole of William's time passed his life under treaties, uncertain, and frequently broken. But when in the reign of William, the son of William, he was attacked in a similar manner, he diverted the king from pursuing him by a false oath. Soon after he was slain, together with his son,² by Robert Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, while regardless of his faith he was devastating the province with more than usual insolence. For many years he lay buried at Tynemouth: lately he was conveyed by Alexander his son to Dunfermelin, in Scotland.

Account of Edgar.

§ 251. Edgar, having submitted to the king with Stigand and Aldred the archbishops, violated his oath the following year, by going over to the Scot: but after living there some years, and acquiring no present advantage, no future prospects, but merely his daily sustenance, being willing to try the liberality of the Norman, who was at that time beyond sea, he sailed over to him. They relate it to have been extremely agreeable to the king, that England should be thus rid of a fomenter of dissension. Indeed it was his constant practice, under colour of high honour, to carry over to Normandy all the English he suspected, lest any disorders should arise in the kingdom during his absence. Edgar, therefore, was well received, and presented with a considerable largess: and remaining at court for many years, silently sunk into contempt through his indolence, or more mildly speaking, his simplicity. For how great must his simplicity be, who would yield up to the king, for a single horse, the pound of silver, which he received as his daily stipend? In succeeding times he went to Jerusalem with Robert, the son of Godwin, a most valiant knight. This was the time when the Turks besieged king Baldwin, at Rama; who, unable to endure the difficulties of a siege, rushed through the midst of the enemy, by the assistance of Robert alone, who preceded him, and hewed down the Turks, on either hand, with his drawn sword; but while, excited to greater ferocity by his success, he was pressing on with too much eagerness, his sword dropped from his hand, and when stooping down to recover it, he was surrounded by a multitude, and cast into chains. Taken thence to Babylon, as they report, when he refused to deny Christ, he was placed as a mark in the middle of the market-place, and being transfixed with darts, died a martyr. Edgar, having lost his companion, returned and received many gifts from the Greek and German emperors; who, from respect to his noble descent, would also have endeavoured to retain him with them; but he gave up everything through regard to his native soil: for, truly, the love of their country deceives some men to such a degree, that nothing seems pleasant to them, unless they can breathe their native air. Edgar, therefore, deluded by this foolish desire, returned to England: where, as I have before said, after various revolutions of fortune, he now grows old in the country in privacy and quiet.¹

¹ Domesday Book bears ample testimony to this statement, and that which closely follows, viz. that the resources of this once flourishing province were cut off by fire, slaughter, and devastation; and that the ground for more than sixty miles, totally uncultivated and unproductive, remained bare to that very day. The land which had belonged to Edwin and Morcar in Yorkshire almost everywhere in the Survey is stated to be wasta; and in Amunderness, after the enumeration of no fewer than sixty-two places, the possessions in which amounted to one hundred and seventy carucates, it is said, "Omnes hæ villæ jacent ad Prestune et iii. ecclesiæ. Ex his xvi. a paucis incoluntur, sed quot sint habitantes ignoratur. Reliqua sunt wasta." Moreover wasta is added to numerous places belonging to the archbishop of York, St. John of Beverley, the bishop of Durham, and to those lands which had belonged to Waltheof, Gospatric, Sward, and Merleswain.

² Malcolm, with his son Edward, was slain on the 13th of November 1093, by Morael of Bamborough, the steward of the earl of Northumberland. See the Sax. Chron.

Account of the Brothers, Edwin and Morcard.

§ 252. Edwin and Morcard were brothers;² the sons of Elfgar, the son of Leofric. They had received charge of the county of Northumberland, and jointly preserved it in tranquillity: for, as I have before observed,¹ a few days previous to the death of king Edward, the inhabitants of the north had risen in rebellion and expelled Tosti their governor: and, with Harold's approbation, had requested and received one of these brothers as their lord. These circumstances, as we have heard from persons acquainted with the affair, took place against the inclination of the king, who was attached to Tosti; but being languid through disease, and worn down with age, he had become so universally disregarded, that he could not assist his favourite. In consequence, his bodily ailments increasing from the anxiety of his mind, he died shortly after. Harold persisted in his resolution of banishing his brother: wherefore, first tarnishing the triumphs of his family by piratical excursions, he was, as I have above written,² afterwards killed with the king of Norway. His body being known by a wart between the shoulders, obtained burial at York. Edwin and Morcard, by Harold's command, then conveyed the spoils of war to London, for he himself was proceeding rapidly to the battle of Hastings; where, falsely presaging, he looked upon the victory as already gained. But, when he was there killed, the brothers, flying to the territories they possessed, disturbed the peace of William for several years; infesting the woods with secret robberies, and never coming to close or open engagement. Often were they taken captive, and as often surrendered themselves, but were again dismissed with impunity, from pity to their youthful elegance, and respect to their nobility. At last, murdered, neither by the force nor craft of their enemies, but by the treachery of their partisans,³ their fate drew tears from the king, who would even long since have united them in marriage with his relations, and granted them the honour of his friendship, if they would have acceded to terms of peace.

² They were the brothers-in-law of Harold, he having married their sister Ealdgyth, widow of Griffith, king of Wales.

§ 253. Waltheof, an earl of high descent,⁴ had become extremely intimate with the new king, who had, heedless of his former offences, attributed them rather to courage than to disloyalty. For Waltheof, singly, had killed many of the Normans in the battle of York; cutting off their heads, one by one, as they entered the gate. He was muscular in the arms, brawny in the chest, tall and robust in his whole person; the son of Siward, a most celebrated earl, whom by a Danish term they called "Digera," which implies Strong. But after the fall of his party, he voluntarily surrendered himself, and was honoured by a marriage with Judith,⁵ the king's niece, as well as with his personal friendship. Unable, however, to restrain his evil inclinations, he could not preserve his fidelity. For all his countrymen who had thought proper to resist, being

³ The Saxon Chronicle states that earl Edwin was treacherously slain by his own men in 1071, and that earl Morcar surrendered himself to the king in the same year.

⁵ Judith was daughter of count Enguerrand, and Adeliza, sister of the Conqueror. William seems to have been very profuse in his grants to her.

either slain or subdued, he became a party even in the perfidy of Ralph de Waher ; but the conspiracy being detected, he was taken, kept in chains for some time, and at last, being beheaded, was buried at Croland ; though some assert that he joined the league of treachery more through necessity than inclination. This is the excuse the English make for him, and those, of the greater credit, for the Normans affirm the contrary, to whose decision the Divinity itself appears to assent, showing many and very great miracles at his tomb ; for they declare that, during his captivity, he wiped away his transgressions by daily sorrow.

§ 254. On this account perhaps the conduct of the king may reasonably be excused, if he was at any time rather severe against the English ; for he scarcely found any one of them faithful. This circumstance so exasperated his ferocious mind, that he deprived the more powerful, first of their wealth, next of their estates, and finally, some of them of their lives. Moreover, he followed the device of Cæsar, who drove out the Germans concealed in the vast forest of Ardennes, whence they harassed his army with perpetual irruptions, not by means of his own countrymen, but by the confederate Gauls ; that, while strangers destroyed each other, he might gain a bloodless victory. Thus, I say, William acted towards the English. For, allowing the Normans to be unemployed, he opposed an English army and an English commander to those who, after the first unsuccessful battle, had fled to Denmark and Ireland, and had returned at the end of three years with considerable force ; foreseeing that whichever side should conquer, it must be a great advantage to himself. Nor did this device fail him ; for both parties of the English, after some conflicts between themselves, without any exertion on his part, left an easy victory for the king ; the invaders being driven to Ireland, and those on the king's side purchasing the empty title of conquest, at their own special loss, and that of their general. His name was Ednod,¹ equally celebrated, before the arrival of the Normans, both at home and abroad. He was the father of Herding, who yet survives : a man more accustomed to kindle strife by his malignant tongue, than to brandish arms in the field of battle. Thus having overturned the power of the laity, he made an ordinance, that no monk or clergyman of that nation should be suffered to aspire to any dignity whatever ; excessively differing from the gentleness of Cnut, the former king, who restored their honours, unimpaired, to the conquered : whence it came to pass, that at his decease, the natives easily expelled the foreigners and reclaimed their original right. But William, from certain causes, canonically deposed some persons, and in the place of such as might die, appointed diligent men of any nation except English. Unless I am deceived, their inveterate frowardness towards the king required such a measure ; since, as I have said before,² the Normans are by nature kindly disposed to those strangers who live amongst them.

§ 255. Ralph, whom I mentioned before,¹ was, by the king's gift, earl of Norfolk and Suffolk; a Breton on his father's side;² a man of a disposition foreign to every thing good. This man, in consequence of being betrothed to the king's relation, the daughter of William Fitz-Osborne, conceived a most unjust design, and meditated an attack on the sovereignty.³ Wherefore, on the very day of his nuptials, whilst splendidly banqueting (for the luxury of the English had now been adopted by the Normans), and when the guests had become intoxicated and heated with wine, he disclosed his intention in a copious harangue. As their reason was entirely clouded by drunkenness, they loudly applauded the orator. Here Roger, earl of Hereford, brother to the wife of Ralph, and here Weldeof, together with many others, conspired the death of the king. Next day, however, when the fumes of the wine had evaporated, and cooler thoughts influenced the minds of some of the party, the majority, repenting of their conduct, retired from the meeting. One of them, (said to have been Weldeof,) at the recommendation of archbishop Lanfranc, sailing to Normandy, related the matter to the king; concealing merely his own share of the business.⁴ The earls, however, persisted in their design, and each incited his dependents to rebel: but God opposed them, and brought all their machinations to nought. For immediately, the king's officers, who had been left in charge, on discovering the affair, reduced Ralph to such distress, that seizing a vessel at Norwich, he put out to sea: his wife, stipulating for personal safety, and delivering up the castle, followed her husband. Roger being thrown into chains by the king, visited, or rather inhabited, a prison, during the remainder of his life; a young man of abominable treachery, and by no means imitating his father's conduct.

§ 256. His father,⁵ indeed, William Fitz-Osbern, might have been compared, nay, I know not if he might not even have been preferred, to the very best of princes. By his advice, William had first been inspirited to invade, and next, assisted by his valour, to keep possession of England. The energy of his mind was seconded by the almost boundless liberality of his hand: hence it arose, that by the multitude of soldiers, to whom he gave extravagant pay, he repelled the rapacity of the enemy, and ensured the favour of the people. In consequence, by this boundless profusion, he incurred the king's severe displeasure; because he had improvidently exhausted his treasures. The regulations which he established in his county of Hereford, remain in full force at the present day; that is to say, that no knight⁶ should be fined more than seven shillings for whatever offence: whereas, in other provinces, for a very small fault in transgressing the commands of their lord, they pay twenty or twenty-five. Fortune, however, closed these happy successes by a dishonourable termination, when the supporter of so great a government, the counsellor of England and Normandy, went into Flanders, through fond regard for a woman, and there died by the hands of his enemies. For the elder Baldwin, of whom I have before spoken, the father of Matilda, had two sons; Robert, who, marrying the countess of Frisia while his father yet lived, acquired the surname of Le Frison: and Baldwin, who, after his father, presided some years over Flanders, and died prematurely, leaving two children, Arnulf and Baldwin, by his wife Richilda, surviving, the guardianship of whom he had entrusted to Philip king of France, (whose aunt was his mother,¹) and to William Fitz-Osberne. William readily undertook this office, that he might increase his dignity by an union with Richilda: but she, through female pride, aspiring to things beyond her sex, and exacting fresh tributes from the people, excited them to rebellion; wherefore despatching a messenger to Robert Le Frison, entreating him to accept the government of the country, they adjured all fidelity to Arnulf, who was already called earl. Nor indeed were there wanting persons to espouse the party of the ward: so that, for a long time, Flanders was disturbed by intestine commotion. Fitz-Osbern, who was deeply in love with the lady, could not endure this, but entered Flanders with a body of troops; and, being immediately well received by the persons whom he came to defend, after some days, he rode securely from castle to castle, in a hasty manner with few attendants. On the other hand, Le Frison, who was acquainted with this piece of folly, entrapped him unawares by a secret ambush, and killed him, fighting bravely but to no purpose, together with his nephew Arnulf.

§ 257. Thus possessed of Flanders, he often irritated king William, by plundering Normandy. His daughter married Cnut, king of the Danes, whose son Charles now rules in Flanders.² He made peace with king Philip, giving him his daughter-in-law in marriage, by whom he had Lewis,³ who at present reigns in France; but not long after, being heartily tired of the match, because his queen was extremely corpulent, he divorced her, and, in defiance of law and equity, married the wife of the earl of Anjou. Robert, safe by his affinity with these princes, encountered nothing to distress him during his government; though Baldwin, the brother of Arnulf, who had an earldom in the province of Hainault and in the castle of Valenciennes, by William's assistance made many attempts for that purpose. Three years before his death, when he was now hoary-headed, he went to Jerusalem, as a means of obtaining pardon for his sins : and on his return, he renounced the world, calmly awaiting his dissolution with Christian earnestness. His son was that Robert so universally famed in the expedition into Asia, which, in our times, Europe undertook against the Turks ; but through some mischance, after his return home, he tarnished that noble exploit, being mortally wounded¹ in a tournament, as they call it. Nor did a happier fate attend his son Baldwin, who voluntarily harassing the forces of Henry king of England, in Normandy, paid dearly for his youthful temerity : for, being struck on the head with a pole, and deceived by the professions of several physicians, he lost his life ; the principality devolving on Charles, of whom we have spoken before.

§ 258. King William, conducting himself with mildness towards the obedient, but with severity to the rebellious, possessed the whole of England in tranquillity, holding all the Welsh tributary to him. At this time, too, beyond sea, being never unemployed, he nearly annihilated the county of Maine, leading thither an expedition composed of English,² who though they had been easily conquered in their own, yet always appeared invincible in a foreign country. He lost multitudes of his men at Dol,³ a town of Brittany, whither, irritated by some broil, he had led a military force. He constantly found Philip king of France, the daughter of whose aunt he had married, unfaithful to him ; because he was envious of the great glory of a man who was vassal both to his father and to himself. But William did not the less actively resist his attempts, although his first-born son, Robert, through foolish counsel, assisted him in opposition to his father : whence it happened, that in an attack at Gerborai, the son became personally engaged with his father, wounded him, and killed his horse ;⁴ William, the second son, departed with a hurt also, and many of the king's party were slain. In all other respects, during the whole of his life, he was so fortunate, that foreign and distant nations feared nothing so much as his name. He had subdued the inhabitants so completely to his will, that, without any opposition, he first caused an account to be taken of every person ; he compiled a register of the rent of every estate throughout England ;⁵ and made all freemen, of every description, take the oath of fidelity to him. le Frison and by his own power, alone menaced his dignity ; a rumour being generally prevalent that he would invade England, as a country belonging to him from his relationship to the ancient Cnut ; and indeed he would have effected it, had not God counteracted his boldness by an unfavourable wind. But this circumstance reminds me that I should briefly trace the genealogy of the Danish kings, who succeeded after our Cnut, adding, at the same time, somewhat concerning the Norwegians.

§ 259. As it has been before observed, Harold succeeded him¹ in England, Hardecnut and his sons in Denmark : for Magnus the son of Olaf, whom I have mentioned in the history of Cnut,² as having been killed by his subjects, had recovered Norway, which Cnut had subdued. Harold dying in England, Hardecnut held both kingdoms for a short time.³ On his decease, Edward the Simple succeeded, who, satisfied with his paternal kingdom, despised a foreign empire as burthensome and barbarous. One Swane, doubtless a most exalted character, was then made king of the Danes. When his government had prospered for several years, Magnus, king of the Norwegians,⁴ with the consent of some of the Danes, expelled him by force, and subjected the land to his own will. Swane, thus expelled, went to the king of Sweden, and collecting by his assistance the Swedes, Vandals, and Goths, he returned to regain the kingdom ; but through the exertions of the Danes, who were attached to the government of Magnus, he experienced a repetition of his former ill-fortune. This was a great and memorable battle among those barbarous people : on no other occasion did the Danes ever experience severer conflict or happier success. Indeed, to this very time they keep unbroken the vow by which they had bound themselves before the contest, that they would consecrate to future ages the vigil of St. Lawrence, (for on that day the battle was fought,) by fasting and alms ; and then also Swane fled, but soon after, on the death of Magnus, he received his kingdom entire.

§ 260. To Magnus, in Norway, succeeded one Swane, surnamed Herdhand, not elevated by royal descent, but by his boldness and cunning ; to him Olaf, the uncle of Magnus, whom they call a saint ; to Olaf, Harold Havagre, the brother of Olaf, who had formerly, when a young man, served under the emperor of Constantinople, and who, when at his command he was exposed to a lion, for having ravished a woman of quality, strangled the huge beast by the bare strength of his arms. He was slain in England, by Harold the son of Godwin.⁵ His sons, Olaf and Magnus, divided the kingdom of their father ; but Magnus dying prematurely, Olaf seized the whole. To him succeeded his son Magnus, who was lately miserably slain in Ireland, on which he had rashly made a descent. They relate that the last mentioned Magnus, the son of Harold, was, after the death of his father, compassionately sent home by Harold, king of England; and that in return for this kindness, he humanely treated Harold, the son of Harold, when he came to him after William's victory; that he took him with him in an expedition he made to England, in the time of William the younger, when he conquered the Orkney and Mevanian Isles¹, and meeting with Hugh earl of Chester, and Hugh earl of Shrewsbury, put the first to flight, and the second to death. The sons of the last Magnus, Hasten and Siward, yet reign conjointly, having divided the empire; the latter, a seemly and spirited youth, shortly since went to Jerusalem, by the route of England, performing many famous exploits against the Saracens; more especially in the siege of Sidon, whose inhabitants raged furiously against the Christians, through their connexion with the Turks.

§ 261. But Swane, as I have related, on his restoration to the sovereignty of the Danes, being impatient of quiet, sent his son Cnut twice into England; first with three hundred, and then with two hundred ships. His associate in the former expedition was Osbern, the brother of Swane, in the latter, Hacco; but, being each of them bribed, they frustrated the young man's designs, and returned home without effecting their purpose. In consequence, becoming highly disgraced by king Swane for bartering their fidelity for money, they were driven into banishment. Swane, when near his end, bound all the inhabitants by oath, that, as he had fourteen sons, they should confer the kingdom on each of them in succession, as long as his issue remained. On his decease his son Harold succeeded for three years; to him Cnut, whom his father had formerly sent into England. Remembering his original failure, he prepared, as we have heard, more than a thousand vessels against England;² his father-in-law, Robert le Frison, the possessor of six hundred more, supporting him; but being detained for almost two years by the adverseness of the wind, he changed his design, affirming that it must be by the determination of God that he could not put to sea; but afterwards, misled by the suggestions of some persons who attributed the failure of their passage to the conjurations of certain old women, he sentenced the chiefs whose wives were accused of this transgression to an intolerable fine; cast his brother Olaf, the principal of the suspected faction, into chains, and sent him into exile to his father-in-law. The barbarians, in consequence, resenting this attack upon their liberty, killed³ him while in church, clinging to the altar, and promising reparation. They say that many miracles were shown from heaven at that place; because he was a man strictly observant of fasting and almsgiving, and pursued the transgressors of the divine laws more rigorously than those who offended against himself; from which circumstance he was consecrated a martyr by the pope of Rome. After him, the murderers, that they might atone for their crime by some degree of good, redeemed Olaf from captivity, for ten thousand marks of silver. After ignobly reigning during eight years, he left the government to his brother Henry, who, living virtuously for twenty-nine years,¹ went to Jerusalem, and breathed his last at sea. Nicholas, the fifth in the sovereignty, still survives.²

§ 262. The king of Denmark then, as I have said, was the only obstacle to William's uninterrupted enjoyment: on whose account he enlisted such an immense multitude of stipendiary soldiers out of every province on this side the mountains, that their numbers oppressed the kingdom: but he, with his usual magnanimity, not regarding the expense, had engaged even Hugh the Great, brother to the king of France, with his bands to serve in his army. He was accustomed to stimulate and incite his own valour, by the remembrance of Robert Guiscard;³ saying it was disgraceful to yield in courage to him whom he surpassed in rank. For Robert, born of middling parentage⁴ in Normandy, that is, neither very low nor very high, had gone, a few years before William's arrival in England, with fifteen knights, into Apulia, to remedy the narrowness of his own circumstances, by entering into the service of that inactive people. Not many years elapsed, ere, by the stupendous assistance of God, he reduced the whole country under his power: for where his strength failed, his ingenuity was alert: first receiving the towns, and after the cities, into confederacy with him. Thus he became so successful, as to make himself duke of Apulia and Calabria; his brother Richard, prince of Capua; and his other brother, Roger, earl of Sicily. At last, giving Apulia to his son Roger, he crossed the Adriatic with his other son Boamund, and taking Durazzo,⁵ was immediately proceeding against Alexis, emperor of Constantinople, when a messenger from pope Hildebrand stopped him in the heat of his career. For Henry, emperor of Germany, son of that Henry⁶ we have before mentioned,⁷ being incensed against the pope, for having excommunicated him on account of the ecclesiastical investitures, led an army against Rome; besieged it;⁸ expelled Hildebrand, and introduced Guibert of Ravenna. Guiscard learning this by the letter of the expelled pope, left his son Boamund, with the army, to follow up his designs, and returned to Apulia; where quickly collecting together a body of Apulians and Normans, he proceeded to Rome. Nor did Henry wait for a messenger to announce his approach; but, affrighted at the bare report, he fled with his pretended pope. Rome, freed from intruders, received its lawful sovereign; but soon after again lost him by similar violence. Then, too, Alexis, learning that Robert was called home by the urgency of his affairs, and hoping to put a finishing hand to the war, rushed against Boamund, who commanded the troops which had been left. The Norman youth, however, observant of his native spirit, though far inferior in number, put to flight, by dint of military skill, the undisciplined Greeks and the other collected nations. At the same time, too, the Venetians, a people habituated to the sea, attacking Guiscard, who having settled the object of his voyage, was now sailing back, met with a similar calamity: part were drowned or killed, and the rest put to flight. He, continuing his intended expedition, induced many cities, subject to Alexis, to second his views. The emperor removed by crime the man whom he was unable to subdue by arms: falsely promising his wife an imperial match: by her artifices, he drank poison,¹ which she had prepared, and died; deserving, had God so pleased, a nobler death: unconquerable by the sword of an enemy, yet falling a victim to domestic treachery. He was buried at Venusium in Apulia,² having the following epitaph:—

Who from the Capitol Rome's sovereign hurl'd.
No band collected could Alexis free,
Flight only: Venice, neither flight nor sea.”

§ 263. And since mention has been made of Hildebrand,³ I shall relate some anecdotes of him, which I have not heard trivially, but from the sober relation of a person who would swear that he had learned them from the mouth of Hugh abbot of Clugny; whom I admire and commend to notice, from the consideration, that he used to declare the secret thoughts of others, by the prophetic intuition of his mind. Alexander, an able pope, seeing the energetic bent of his disposition, had made him chancellor⁴ of the holy see. In consequence, by virtue of his office, he used to go through the provinces to correct abuses. All ranks of people flocked to him, requiring judgment on various affairs: all secular power was subject to him, as well out of regard to his sanctity, as to his office. It happened, one day, when there was a greater concourse on horseback than usual, that the abbot aforesaid, with his monks, was gently proceeding in the last rank; and beholding, at a distance, the distinguished honour of this man, that so many earthly rulers awaited his nod, he was revolving in his mind sentiments to the following effect: "By what dispensation of God was this fellow, of diminutive stature and obscure parentage, surrounded by a retinue of so many rich men. Doubtless, from having such a crowd of attendants, he was vainglorious, and conceived loftier notions than were becoming." Scarcely, as I have said, had he imagined this in his heart, when the archdeacon, turning back his horse, and spurring him, cried out, from a distance, beckoning the abbot, "You," said he, "you have imagined falsely; wrongly deeming me guilty of a thing, of which I am innocent altogether: for I neither impute this as glory to myself, if glory that can be called which vanishes quickly, nor do I wish it to be so imputed by others, but to the blessed apostles, to whose servant it is exhibited." Reddening with shame, and not daring to deny a tittle, he replied only, "My lord, I pray thee, how couldest thou know the secret thought of my heart, which I have communicated to no one?" "All that inward sentiment of yours," said he, "was brought from your mouth to my ears, as though by a pipe."

² He died 17th of July, 1085, in the isle of Cephalonia, in his tent.

§ 264. Again, entering a country church, in the same province, they prostrated themselves before the altar side by side. When they had continued their supplications for a long period, the archdeacon looked on the abbot with an angry countenance. After they had prayed some time longer, he went out, and asking the reason of his displeasure, received this answer, "If you love me, do not again attack me with an injury of this kind: my Lord Jesus Christ, beautiful beyond the sons of men, was visibly present to my entreaties, listening to what I said, and kindly looking assent; but, attracted by the earnestness of your prayer, He left me, and turned to you: I think you will not deny it to be a species of injury, to take from a friend the Author of his salvation. Moreover, you are to know, that mortality of mankind, and destruction, hang over this place; and the token by which I formed such a conclusion was, by seeing the angel of the Lord standing upon the altar, with a naked sword, and waving it to and fro: I possess a more manifest proof of the impending ruin, from the thick cloudy air, which, as you see, already envelopes that province. Let us make haste to escape, then, lest we perish with the rest." Having said this, they entered an inn for refreshment; but as soon as food was placed before them, the lamentations of the household took away their famished appetites: for first one, and then another, and presently many of the family suddenly lost their lives by some unseen disaster. The contagion then spreading to the adjoining houses, they mounted their mules, and departed; fear adding wings to their flight.

Account of a Bishop who obtained his See by Simony.

§ 265. Hildebrand had presided for the pope, at a council in Gaul, where many bishops, being degraded for having formerly acquired their churches by simony, gave place to better men. There was one, to whom a suspicion of this apostasy attached, but he could neither be convicted by any witnesses, nor confuted by any argument: when it was supposed he must be completely foiled, still, like the slippery snake, he eluded detection; so skilled was he in speaking, that he baffled all. Then said the archdeacon, "Let the oracle of God be resorted to, let man's eloquence cease; we know for certain that episcopal grace is the gift of the Holy Spirit, and that whosoever purchases a bishopric, supposes the gift of the Holy Ghost may be procured by money. Before us then, who are assembled by the will of the Holy Ghost, let him say, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost," and if he shall speak it articulately, and without hesitation, it will be manifest to me that he has obtained his office, not by purchase, but legally." He willingly accepted the condition, supposing nothing less than any difficulty in these words; and indeed he perfectly uttered, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son," but he hesitated at the "Holy Ghost." A clamour arose on all sides, but he was never able, by any exertion, either at that time or for the remainder of his life, to name the Holy Spirit. The abbot so often mentioned was a witness of this miracle: who taking the deprived bishop with him into different places, often laughed at the issue of the experiment. Any person doubting the certainty of this relation, must be confuted by all Europe, which is aware that the numbers of the Clugniac order were increased by this abbot.

§ 266. On the death of Alexander, therefore, Hildebrand, called Gregory the Seventh,¹ succeeded. He openly asserted, what others had whispered; excommunicating those persons who, having been elected, should receive the investiture of their churches by the ring and staff, through the hands of a layman. On this account, Henry, emperor of Germany, being incensed that one elected without his concurrence should so far presume, expelled him from Rome, as I observed, after the expiration of eleven years, and brought in Guibert. Not long after, the pope being seized with that fatal disease, which he had no doubt would be mortal, was requested by the cardinals to appoint his successor; referring him to the example of St. Peter, who, in the church's earliest infancy, had, while yet living, nominated Clement. He refused to follow this example, because it had anciently been forbidden by councils: he would advise, however, that if they wished a person powerful in worldly matters, they should choose Desiderius, abbot of Cassino, who would quell the violence of Guibert successfully, and opportunely, by a military force; but, if they wanted a religious and eloquent man, they should elect Odo bishop of Ostia. Thus died a man highly acceptable with God, though perhaps rather too austere towards man. Indeed it is affirmed, that in the beginning of the first commotion between him and the emperor, he would not admit him within his doors, though bare-footed, and carrying² sheers and scourges; despising a man guilty of sacrilege, and of incest with

² This seems intended to denote his absolute submission and willingness to undergo any kind of penance which might be enjoined him. his own sister. The emperor, thus excluded, departed, vowing that this repulse should be the death of many a man. And immediately doing all the injury he was able to the Roman see, he excited thereby the favourers of the pope, on every side, to throw off their allegiance to himself; for one Rodolph, revolting at the command of the pope, who had sent him a crown in the name of the apostles, he was immersed on all sides in the tumults of war. But Henry, ever superior to ill-fortune, at length subdued him, and the rest of the faithless rebels. At last, driven from his power, not by a foreign attack, but the domestic hatred of his son, he died miserably. To Hildebrand succeeded Desiderius, called Victor, who, at his first mass, fell down dead, though from what mischance is unknown; the cup, if it be possible to credit such a thing, being poisoned. The election then fell upon Odo, a Frenchman by birth; first arch-deacon of Rheims, then prior of Clugny, afterwards bishop of Ostia, lastly pope, by the name of Urban.

§ 267. Thus far I shall be pardoned for having wandered abroad, as from the mention of William's transactions some things occurred which I thought it improper to omit; now the reader, who is so inclined, shall learn the more common habits of his life, and his domestic manners. Above all, then, he was humble to the servants of God; affable to the obedient; inexorable to the rebellious. He attended the offices of the Christian religion as much as a layman was able; so that he daily was present at mass, and heard vespers and matins. He built one monastery in England, and another in Normandy; that at Caen¹ first, which he dedicated to St. Stephen, and endowed with suitable estates, and most magnificent presents. There he appointed Lanfranc, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, abbot; a man worthy to be compared to the ancients, in knowledge, and in religion: of whom it may be truly said, "Cato the third is descended from heaven;" so much had an heavenly savour tinctured his heart and tongue; so much was the whole western world excited to the knowledge of the liberal arts by his learning; and so earnestly did the monastic profession labour in the work of religion, either from his example or authority. No sinister means profited a bishop in those days; nor could an abbot procure advancement by purchase: he who had the best report for undeviating sanctity, was most honoured and most esteemed both by the king and by the archbishop. William built the other monastery near Hastings, dedicated to St. Martin, which was also called Battle,² because there the principal church stands on the very spot, where, as they report, Harold was found in the thickest heaps of the slain. When little more than a boy, yet gifted with the wisdom of age, he removed his uncle Malger from the archbishopric of Rouen. He was a man not ordinarily learned, but, through his high birth, forgetful of his profession, he gave too much attention to hunting and hawking; and consumed the treasures of the church in a splendid mode of living: this being much bruited about, he never, during his whole life-time, obtained the pall, the holy see refusing the distinction of that honour to a man who neglected his sacred office. Wherefore being frequently cited, his nephew reprehending his offences; but he, still conducting himself in the same manner, was, from the urgency of the case, ultimately degraded. Some report that there was a secret reason for his being deprived: that Matilda, whom William had married, was very nearly related to him: that Malger, in consequence, through zeal for the Christian faith, could not endure that they should riot in the bed of consanguinity; and that he hurled the weapon of excommunication against his nephew and his consort: that, when the anger of the young man was roused by the complaints of his wife, an occasion was sought out, through which the persecutor of their crime might be driven from his see: but that afterwards, in riper years, for the expiation of their offence, he built the monastery to St. Stephen at Caen; and she also one, in the same town, to the Holy Trinity;¹ each of them choosing the inmates according to their own sex.

§ 268. To Malger succeeded Maurilius, a monk of Fescamp; he was commendable for many virtues, but principally for his abstinence. After a holy and well-spent life, when he came, by the call of God, to his end, bereft of vital breath, he lay, as it were, dead for almost half a day: nevertheless, when preparation was made to carry him into the church, recovering his breath, he melted the by-standers with tears of joy, and comforted them, when lost in amazement, with this address:—"Let your minds be attentive while you hear the last words of your pastor. I have died a natural death, but I am come back to relate to you what I have seen; yet shall I not continue with you long, because it delights me to sleep in the Lord. The conductors of my spirit were adorned with every elegance, both of countenance and attire; the gentleness of their speech accorded with the splendour of their garments; so much so, that I could wish for nothing more than the attentions of such men. Delighted, therefore, with their soothing approbation, I went, as it appeared to me, towards the East. A seat in Paradise was promised me, which I was shortly to enter. In a moment, passing over Europe and entering Asia, we came to Jerusalem; where, having worshipped the saints, we proceeded to Jordan; the residents on either bank joining company with my conductors, made a joyful party. I was now hastening to pass over the river, through longing desire to see what was beyond it, when my companions informed me that God had commanded, that I must first be terrified by the sight of the demons, in order that the venial sins which I had not wiped out by confession, might be expiated, by the dread of terrific forms. As soon as this was said, there came opposite to me such a multitude of devils, brandishing pointed weapons, and breathing out fire, that the plain appeared like steel, and the air like flame. I was so dreadfully alarmed at them, that had the earth clave asunder, or the heaven opened, I should not have known where to have betaken myself for safety. Thus panic-stricken, and doubting where to go, I suddenly recovered my life, though instantaneously about to lose it again, that by this relation I might be serviceable to your salvation, unless you neglect it ;” and almost as soon as he had so said, he breathed out his soul. His body, then buried underground, in the church of St. Mary, is now, by divine miracle, as they report, raised up more than three feet above the earth.

§ 269. Moreover, William, following up the design he had formerly begun in Normandy, permitted Stigand, the wicked and false archbishop, to be deposed by the Roman cardinals and by Ermenfred bishop of Sion. Walkelin succeeded him at Winchester, whose good works, surpassing fame, will resist the power of oblivion as long as the episcopal see shall there continue ; in Kent succeeded Lanfranc, of whom I have before spoken, who was, by the gift of God, as resplendent in England, so much did the monastic germ sprout by his care, so strongly grew the pontifical power while he survived. The king was but the servant of his advice, in such wise that he deemed it proper to concede whatever Lanfranc asserted ought to be done. At his instigation, also, was abolished the infamous custom of those ill-disposed people who used to sell their slaves into Ireland. The credit of this action I know not exactly whether to attribute to Lanfranc or to Wulstan bishop of Worcester ; who would scarcely have induced the king, reluctant from the profit it produced him, to this measure, had not Lanfranc recommended it, and Wulstan, powerful from his sanctity of character, enjoined it by episcopal authority : Wulstan, than whom none could be more just, nor could any in our time equal him in the power of miracles, or the gift of prophecy ; of which I purpose hereafter to relate some particulars, should it meet his most holy approbation.

“ As Lucifer, who bids the stars retire, Day’s rosy harbinger with purple fire ;”

§ 270. But since the die of fortune is subject to uncertain casts, many calamities happened during those times. There was a disgraceful contention¹ between the abbot of Glastonbury and his monks ; so that after altercation they came to blows. The monks being driven into the church, bewailed their miseries at the holy altar ; but the soldiers, rushing in, slew two of them, wounded fourteen, and drove away the rest : nay, the rage of the military even bristled the crucifix with arrows. The abbot, rendered infamous by such a criminal outrage, was driven into exile for the whole of the king’s life ; but, upon his decease, he was restored to his honours ; a sum

§ 271. Again, a cruel and ignominious end overtook Walker,¹ bishop of Durham, whom the Northumbrians, a people ever ripe for rebellion, throwing off all respect for his holy orders, put to death, after having severely insulted him. A considerable number of Lorrainers were killed there also; for the bishop was of that country. The cause of the murder was this: the bishop, independently of his see, was governor of the whole country:² over public business he had set his relation Gilbert, and over domestic, the canon Leobin; both men of diligence in their respective employments, but rash. The bishop endured their want of moderation in this respect, out of regard to their activity; and, as he had placed them in office, treated them with great kindness: for our nature ever indulges itself, and favourably regards its own kind works. This Leobin caused Liulf, a servant so dearly beloved by St. Cuthbert that the saint himself used to appear to him, even when waking, and direct his decisions; him, I say, he caused to be killed by Gilbert; smitten with envy at his holding the higher place in the prelate's esteem for his knowledge and equity in legal determinations. Walker, terrified with this intelligence, offered the furious family of the deceased the result of a legal inquiry,³ affirming that Leobin would be the cause of his death and of that of his friends. When the matter came to a trial, this ferocious race of people were not to be soothed by reasons of any kind; on the contrary, they threw the whole blame on the bishop, because they had seen both the murderers familiarly entertained in his court after the death of Liulf. Hence arose clamour and indignation, and Gilbert, as he was, of his own accord, going out of the church where he had been sitting with the bishop, that he might, at his personal peril, save the life of his master, was impiously slain. The bishop, while making overtures of peace before the gates, next glutted the rage of the people with his blood: the fomentor of the crime, too, Leobin, was half-burnt, as he would not quit the church till it was set on fire, and when he rushed out, he was received on a thousand spears. This had been predicted by Edgitha, relict of king Edward; for when she had formerly seen Walker, with his milk-white hair, rosy countenance, and extraordinary stature, conducted to Winchester to be consecrated: "We have here," said she, "a noble martyr:" being led to form such a presage, by reflecting on the mutinous disposition of that people. To him succeeded William abbot of St. Carilef,⁴ who established monks at Durham.

² The bishops of Durham were palatinate lords, and had in the county of Durham "regaleum potestatem in omnibus" as fully as the king had in his palace. Bract. iii. 8, § 4.

§ 272. Moreover, the year before the king's death, there was a mortality both among men and cattle, and severe tempests, accompanied with such thunder and lightning as no person before had ever seen or heard. And in the year he died, a contagious fever destroyed more than half the people; indeed the attack of the disease killed many, and then, from the unseasonableness of the weather, a famine following, it spread universally and cut off those whom the fever had spared.

§ 273. In addition to his other virtues, he, more especially in early youth, was observant of chastity; insomuch, that it was very commonly reported that he was impotent: marrying, however, at the recommendation of the nobility, he conducted himself, during many years, in such wise, as never to be suspected of any criminal intercourse. He had many children by Matilda, who, obedient to her husband and fruitful in issue, excited his mind to the tenderest regard for her; although there are not wanting persons who prate about his having renounced his former chastity; and that, after he had acceded to the royal dignity, he was connected with the daughter of a certain priest, whom the queen caused to be removed by being hamstrung by one of her servants; on which account he was exiled, and Matilda was scourged to death with a bridle. But I esteem it folly to believe this of so great a king; though I decidedly assert that a slight disagreement arose between them, in latter times, on account of their son Robert, whom his mother was said to have supplied with military forces out of her revenues. Nevertheless, he proved that his conjugal affection was not in the least diminished by this circumstance; as he buried her with great magnificence on her death, four years before his own; and, weeping most profusely for many days, showed how keenly he felt her loss: moreover, from that time, if we give credit to report, he refrained from every gratification. The queen was buried at Caen, in the monastery of the Holy Trinity.¹ The same proof of regard was evident in the care he took of the funeral of queen Edgitha;² who, having been entombed, by his directions, near her husband at Westminster, has a tomb richly wrought with gold and silver.

§ 274. His sons were Robert, Richard, William, and Henry. The two last reigned after him successively in England: Robert, irritated that Normandy was refused him during his father's lifetime, went indignantly into Italy, that by marrying the daughter of Boniface the marquis, he might procure assistance in those parts to oppose the king; but failing of this connection, he excited Philip king of France against his father: wherefore, disappointed of his paternal blessing and inheritance, at his father's death, he missed England, retaining with difficulty the duchy of Normandy; and pawning³ even this, at the expiration of nine years, to his brother William, he joined the expedition into Asia, with the other Christians. From thence, at the end of four years, he returned with credit for his military exploits; and without difficulty sat himself down in Normandy,¹ because, his brother William being recently dead, king Henry, unsettled on account of his fresh-acquired power, deemed it enough to retain England under his command; but, as I must speak of this in another place, I will here pursue the relation I had begun concerning the sons of William the Great.

§ 275. Richard afforded his noble father hopes of his future greatness; he was a noble youth and of an aspiring disposition, considering his age; but an untimely death quickly withered the bud of this promising flower. They relate, that while hunting deer in the New Forest, he contracted a disorder from a stream of foul air.² This is the place which William, his father, desolating the towns and destroying the churches for more than thirty miles, had turned into a forest and haunt for wild beasts. ³Here he willingly passed his time, here he delighted to follow the chase, I will not say for days, but even months together. Here, too, many accidents befel the royal race, which the recent recollection of the inhabitants supplies to inquirers; for in this very forest, William his son, and his grandson Richard, son of Robert, earl of Normandy, by the severe judgment of God, met their deaths, one by a wound in the breast by an arrow, the other by a wound in the neck; or as some say, from being suspended by the jaws on the branch of a tree, as his horse passed beneath it.

§ 276. His daughters were five; first, Cecilia,⁴ abbess of Caen, who still survives; the second, Constantia, married to Alan Fergant earl of Brittany, excited the inhabitants by the severity of her justice to administer a poisonous potion to her; the third, Adela, the wife of Stephen earl of Blois, a lady celebrated for secular industry, lately took the veil at Marcigny. The names of the two others have escaped me: ⁵one of these, as we have said,⁶ was be-

² Some historians relate that he died from the wounds he received from the goring of a stag's horns about three years before his father's decease. Malmesbury's account, however, is probably the truest. Richard was buried at Winchester, and his epitaph styles him Beornie dux. Sanderson's Geneal. Hist. fol. 1707.

³ Some MSS. instead of this read, "A dreadful spectacle indeed, that, where before had existed human intercourse and the worship of God, there deer and goats, and other animals of that kind, should now range unrestrained; and not allowed to be taken by the people at large. Hence it is truly asserted that in this very forest &c." (as in the text.)

"*Audivi quandam de detinisse sororem,
Cujus fama meas aliquando perculit aures.
Nomen ite elapsun, vidisse tamen reminiscor.*"

Note in Bouq. xi. 189.

⁵ The names of William the Conqueror's five daughters, as given by Ordericus Vitalis (lib. iv. 512), were Agatha, Constantia, Adeliza, Adela, and Cecilia. William of Jumièges (vi. 31) states that Adeliza was betrothed to Harold. Later historians speak of Margaret and Elianor; the former as being betrothed to Harold, the other to Alfonso VI. king of Leon. See Tyrrel, Hist. Engl. ii. 61; and Lyttleton's Hist. of Henry II. i. 356.

trothed to Harold, and died ere she was marriageable; the other was affianced, by messengers, to Alphonso, king of Galicia, but obtained from God a virgin-death. A hard substance, which proved the frequency of her prayers, was found upon her knees after her decease.

§ 277. Honouring the memory of his father, by every practicable method, in the latter part of his life, he caused his bones, formerly interred at Nicea, to be taken up by means of a person sent for that purpose, in order to convey them elsewhere; who successfully returning, stopped in Apulia, on hearing of the death of William, and there buried this illustrious man's remains. He treated his mother, who, before the death of his father, had married one Herlewin de Conte-ville, a man of moderate wealth, with singular indulgence as long as she lived. William's brothers by this match were Robert,¹ a man of heavy sluggish disposition, whom he made earl of Moriton; and Odo,² whom, while he was earl, he made bishop of Baieux; and when king, created him earl of Kent. Being of quicker talents than the other, he was governor of all England, under the king, after the death of William Fitz-Osbern. He had wonderful skill in accumulating treasure, possessed extreme craft in dissembling, so that, though absent, yet, stuffing the scrips of the pilgrims with letters and money, he had nearly purchased the Roman papacy from the citizens. But when, through the rumour of his intended journey, soldiers eagerly flocked to him from all parts of the kingdom, the king, taking offence, threw him into confinement, saying that he did not seize the bishop of Baieux, but the earl of Kent. His partisans being intimidated by threats, discovered such quantities of gold that the heap of precious metal would surpass the belief of the present age; and at last many sacks full of wrought gold were also taken out of the rivers, which he had secretly buried in certain places. When released, at the death of his brother, he joined Robert's party, as he was averse to his nephew William; but then, too, matters turning out unfavourably, he was banished England, and went over to his nephew and his bishopric in Normandy. Afterwards, proceeding with him on his enterprise to Jerusalem, he died at Antioch while it was besieged by the Christians.

§ 278. King William kindly admitted foreigners to his friendship, bestowed honours on them without distinction, and was attentive to almsgiving; he gave many possessions in England to foreign churches, and scarcely did his own munificence, or that of his nobility, leave any monastery unnoticed, more especially in Normandy, so that their poverty was mitigated by the riches of England. Thus, in his time, the monastic flock increased on every side, monasteries arose, ancient in their rule, but modern in building; but at this I fancy I hear some persons mutter that it would have been better that the old should have been preserved in their original state, than that new ones should have been erected from their plunder.

§ 279. He was of moderate stature, extraordinary corpulence, and fierce countenance; his forehead was bare of hair; he was of such great strength of arm that it was often matter of surprise that no one was able to draw his bow, which he himself could bend when his horse was at full gallop; he was majestic, whether sitting or standing, although the protuberance of his belly deformed the dignity of his appearance; of excellent health, so that he was never confined with any dangerous disorder, except at the last; so addicted was he to the pleasures of the chase, that, as I have before said, ejecting the inhabitants, he let a space of many miles grow desolate, that, when at liberty from other avocations, he might there pursue his pleasures. He gave sumptuous and splendid entertainments at the principal festivals; passing, during the years he could conveniently remain in England, Christmas at Gloucester, Easter at Winchester, and Pentecost at Westminster. At these times a royal edict summoned thither all the principal persons of every order, that the ambassadors from foreign nations might admire the splendour of the assemblage, and the costliness of the banquets. Nor was he at any time more affable or indulgent; in order that the visitants might proclaim universally that his generosity kept pace with his riches. This mode of banqueting was constantly observed by his first successor; the second omitted it.

§ 280. The only thing for which he can deservedly be blamed is his hoarding of money, which he sought all opportunities of scraping together, provided he could allege that they were honourable and not unbecoming the royal dignity: but he will readily be excused, because a new government cannot be administered without large revenues. I have here no excuse whatever to offer, unless it be, as one has said, that "Of necessity he must fear many whom many fear." For through dread of his enemies he used to drain the country of money, with which he might retard, or repel their attacks; very often, as it happens in human affairs, where strength failed, purchasing the forbearance of his enemies with gold. This disgraceful calamity is still prevalent, and every day increases; so that, both towns and churches are subjected to contributions; nor is this done with firm-kept faith on the part of the imposers, but whoever offers the higher bribe carries off the prize, all former agreements being disregarded.

§ 281. Residing in his latter days in Normandy, when enmity had arisen between him and the king of France, he for a short period was confined to the house; Philip, scoffing at this forbearance, is reported to have said, "The king of England is lying-in at Rouen, and keeps his bed, like a woman after her delivery;" jesting on his belly, which he had been reducing by medicine. Cruelly hurt at this sarcasm, he replied, "When I go to mass, after my confinement, I will make him an offering of an hundred thousand candles."¹ He swore this, "by the Resurrection and the splendour of God ;" for he was wont purposely to swear such oaths as, by the very opening of his mouth, would strike terror into the minds of his hearers.

§ 282. Not long after, in the end of the month of August, when the corn was ripe in the fields, the clusters on the vines, and the orchards laden with fruit in full abundance, collecting an army, he entered France in an hostile manner, trampling down, and laying everything waste ; nothing could assuage his irritated mind, so determined was he to revenge this injurious taunt at the expense of multitudes. At last he set fire to the city of Mantes, where the church of St. Mary was burnt, together with a recluse who did not think it justifiable to quit her cell even under such an emergency ; and the whole property of the citizens was destroyed. Exhilarated by this success, while furiously commanding his people to add fuel to the conflagration, he approached too near the flames, and contracted a disorder from the violence of the fire and the intensesness of the autumnal heat. Some say that his horse leaping over a dangerous ditch, ruptured his rider, for his belly projected over the front of the saddle. Injured by this accident he sounded a retreat, and returning to Rouen, as the malady increased he took to his bed. His physicians, when consulted, affirmed, from an inspection of his urine, that his decease was inevitable. On hearing this he filled the house with his lamentations, because death had suddenly seized him before he could effect that reformation of life which he had for a long time meditated. Recovering his fortitude, however, he performed the duties of a Christian in confession and by receiving the communion. Reluctantly, and by compulsion, he bestowed Normandy on Robert, to William he gave England, while Henry received his maternal possessions.¹ He ordered all his prisoners to be released and pardoned, his treasures to be brought forth and distributed to the churches ; he gave also a certain sum of money to repair the church which had been lately burnt. Thus rightly ordering all things, he departed on the eighth of the ides of September, in the twenty-first year of his reign, the fifty-second of his duchy, the fifty-ninth of his age, and in the year of our Lord one thousand and eighty-seven. This was the same year in which Cnut, king of Denmark, as we have before related,² was killed ; and in which the Spanish Saracens raging against the Christians, were shortly compelled to retire to their own territories by Alfonso, king of Galicia, unwillingly evacuating even the cities they had formerly occupied.

§ 283. The body, embalmed after royal custom, was brought down the river Seine to Caen, and there consigned to the earth, a large assembly of the clergy attending, but few of the laity. Here might be seen the wretchedness of earthly vicissitude; for that man, who was formerly the glory of all Europe, and more powerful than any of his predecessors, could not find a place for his last rest without contention: for a certain knight,¹ to whose patrimony the place belonged, loudly exclaiming at the robbery, forbade his burial; saying, that the ground was his own by paternal right, and that the king had no claim to rest in a place which he had forcibly invaded. Whereupon, at the desire of Henry, (the only one of his sons who was present,) an hundred pounds of silver were paid to this brawler, and quieted his audacious claim: for at that time Robert, his elder born, was in France, carrying on a war against his own country; William had sailed for England ere the king had well breathed his last, thinking it more advantageous to look to his future benefit than to be present at the funeral of his father. Moreover, neither slow nor sparing in spending money, he brought forth from its secret hoard all that treasure which had been accumulated at Winchester, during a reign of so many years: to the monasteries he gave a piece of gold, to each parish church five shillings in silver, to every county an hundred pounds, to be divided to each poor man severally. He also very splendidly adorned the tomb of his father, with a large mass of gold and silver and the refulgence of precious stones.

§ 284. At this time lived Berengar, the heresiarch of Tours, who denied that the bread and wine, when placed on the altar and consecrated by the priest, were, as the holy church affirms, the real and substantial Body of the Lord. Already was the whole of Gaul infected with this his doctrine, disseminated by means of poor scholars, whom he allured by daily hire. On this account pope Leo, of holiest memory, alarmed for the catholic faith, calling a council against him at Vercelli, dispersed the darkness of this misty error by the effulgence of evangelical testimony: but when, after his death, the poison of heresy again burst forth from the bosoms of some worthless people where it had long been nurtured, Hildebrand, in councils, when he was archdeacon, at Tours, and afterwards, when pope, at Rome, compelled him, after being convicted, to the abjuration of his opinion; which matters any person desirous of seeing will find recorded in their proper place. Archbishop Lanfranc² and Guimund, the most eloquent man of our times, first monk of St. Leufrid, in Normandy, afterwards bishop of Aversa in Apulia, confuted him, but principally and most forcibly the latter. And, indeed, though Berengar disgraced the earlier part of his life by defending certain heresies, yet he came so much to his senses in riper age, that without hesitation he was by some esteemed a saint; admired for innumerable good qualities, but especially for his humility and alms-giving; shewing himself master of his large possessions by dispersing, not their slave by hoarding and worshipping, them. He was so guarded with respect to female beauty, that he would never suffer a woman to appear before him, lest he should seem to enjoy that beauty with his eye which he did not desire in his heart. He was used neither to despise the poor nor flatter the rich: to live by nature's rule, "and having food and raiment," in the language of the apostle, "therewith to be content." In consequence, Hildebert,¹ bishop of Mans, an excellent poet, highly commends him; whose words I have purposely inserted, that I may shew this celebrated bishop's regard to his master; and at the same time his opinion will serve for an example to posterity, how he thought a man ought to live, although, perhaps from the strength of his affection, he may have exceeded the bounds of just commendation.

"The fame, the world allows his due,
 Shall Berengar, when dead, pursue;
 Whom, placed on faith's exalted height
 The fifth day ravish'd with fell spite:
 Sad was that day, and fatal too,
 Where grief and loss united grew,
 Wherein the church's hope and pride,
 The law, with its supporter, died.
 What sages taught or poets sung,
 Bowed to his wit and honey'd tongue.
 Then holier wisdom's path he trod,
 And filled his heart and lips with God.
 His soul, his voice, his actions proved
 The great Creator's praise he loved.
 So good, so wise, his growing fame
 Shall soar above the greatest name:
 Whose rank preserved his honours gain'd,
 Preferr'd the poor to rich; maintain'd
 The sternest justice. Wealth's wide power
 Ne'er gave to sloth, or waste, an hour,
 Nor could repeated honours, high,
 Seduce him from humility;
 Who ne'er on money set his mind,
 But grieved he could no object find
 Where he might give; and help'd the poor
 Till poverty assail'd his door,
 His life by nature's laws to guide,
 His mind from vice, his lips from pride,
 Still was his care; to false, the true
 Prefer, and nothing senseless do;
 Evil to none, but good impart,
 And banish lucre, hand and heart.
 Whose dress was coarse, and temperance just,
 Awaited appetite's keen gust;
 Was chastity's perpetual guest,
 Nor let rank lust disturb his rest.
 When nature formed him, 'See,' said she,
 'While others fade, one born for me.'
 Ere justice sought her place of rest
 On high, he lock'd her in his breast.
 A saint from boyhood, whose great name
 Surpasses his exceeding fame,
 Which, though the wide world it may fill,
 Shall never reach his merit still.
 Pious and grave, so humble yet,
 That envy ne'er could him beset;
 For envy weeps, whom still before
 She hated, prone now to adore;
 First for his life, but now his fate
 She moans, laments his frail estate.

Man truly wise and truly blest !
 Thy soul and body both at rest,
 May I, when dead, abide with you,
 And share the self-same portion too."

§ 285. You may perceive in these verses that the bishop exceeded the just measure of praise, but eloquence is apt to recommend itself in such wise; thus a brilliant style proceeds in graceful strain; thus " Bewitching eloquence sheds purple flowers."

But though Berengar himself changed his sentiments, yet was he unable to convert all whom he had infected throughout the world, so dreadful a thing it is to seduce others from what is right, either by example or by word; as perhaps, in consequence, you must bear the sins of others after having atoned for your own. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, whom Mary, the mother of our Lord, was seen to cure when sick, by the milk of her breasts,¹ is said to have predicted this; for when, lying in the last extremity, he was visited by many persons, and the house was scarcely large enough to hold the company, he darted his eye through the throng, and endeavoured to drive away Berengar with all the force he had remaining, protesting that an immense devil stood near him, and attempted to seduce many persons to follow him by beckoning with his hand and whispering some enticement. Moreover, Berengar himself, when about to expire on the day of the Epiphany, sadly sighing at the recollection of the wretched people whom, when a very young man, in the heat of error, he had infected with his opinions, exclaimed, " To-day, in the day of his manifestation, my Lord Jesus Christ will appear to me, either to glorify me, as I hope, for my repentance, or to punish me, as I fear, for the heresy I have propagated among others."

§ 286. We indeed believe that, after the benediction of the priest, those mysteries become the very Body and Blood of the Saviour, induced to such an opinion by the authority of the ancient church and by many miracles recently manifested; such as that which St. Gregory exhibited at Rome and such as Paschasius relates to have taken place in Germany, that the priest Plegild visibly touched the form of a boy upon the altar, and that after kissing him he partook of him, turned into the similitude of bread, after the custom of the church: which, they relate, Berengar used arrogantly to cavil at, and to say that it was the treacherous covenant of a scoundrel, to destroy with his teeth him whom he had kissed with his mouth. Such, too, is that concerning the Jewish boy, who by chance running playfully into a church, with a Christian of the same age, saw a child torn to pieces on the altar and severally divided to the people; which, when with childish innocence he related as truth to his parents, they placed him in a furnace, where the fire was burning and the door closed: whence, after many hours, he was snatched by the Christians, without injury to his person, clothes, or hair; and being asked how he could escape the devouring flames, he replied, " That beautiful woman whom I saw sitting in the chair, whose Son was divided among the people, always stood at my right

The Discovery of the Body of Walwen.

§ 287. At that time, in a province of Wales, called Ros, was found the sepulchre of Walwen, the noble nephew of Arthur: he reigned, a most renowned knight, in that part of Britain which is still named Walweitha, but was driven from his kingdom by the brother and nephew of Hengist, of whom I have spoken in my first book, though not without first making them pay dearly for his expulsion. He deservedly shared with his uncle the praise of retarding, for many years, the calamity of his falling country. The sepulchre of Arthur is no where to be seen, whence ancient ballads fable that he is still to come. But the tomb of the other, as I have suggested, was found in the time of king William on the sea coast, fourteen feet long: there, as some relate, he was wounded by his enemies and suffered shipwreck, others say he was killed by his subjects at a public entertainment. The truth consequently is doubtful; though neither of these men was inferior to the reputation they have acquired.

§ 288. This, too, was the period in which Germany, for fifty years, bewailed the pitiable, and almost fatal government of Henry, of whom I have spoken in the history of William. He was neither unlearned nor indolent; but so singled out by fate for every person to attack, that whoever took up arms against him, seemed, to himself, to be acting for the good of religion. He had two sons, Conrad and Henry; the first, not violating the rights of nature towards his father,¹ having subjugated Italy, died at Arezzo, a city of Tuscany: the other, in his early age, attacking his father, when he was somewhat at rest from external molestation, compelled him to retire from the empire, and when he died, shortly after, honoured him with an imperial funeral. He still survives, obstinately adhering to those very sentiments, on account of which he thought himself justified in persecuting his father; for he grants the investiture of churches by the staff and ring, and looks upon the pope as not legally elected without his concurrence; although Calixtus, who now presides over the papal see,² has greatly restrained this man's inordinate ambition: but let the reader wait my farther relation of these matters in their proper order.

§ 289. Moreover, pope Hildebrand dying, as I have said, and Urban being elected by the cardinals, the emperor persisted in his intention of preferring Guibert, of proclaiming him pope, and of bringing him to Rome, by the expulsion of the other. The army, however, of the marchioness Matilda,³ a woman who, forgetful of her sex, and comparable to the ancient Amazons, used to lead forth her hardy troops to battle, espoused the juster cause, as it seemed ; by her assistance, in succeeding time, Urban obtaining the papal throne, held quiet possession of it for eleven years. After him Paschal was appointed by the Romans, who held Henry's concurrence in contempt. Guibert yet burdened the earth with his existence, the only sower of sedition, who never during his whole life laid aside his obstinacy nor conformed to justice, saying, that the decision of the emperor ought to be observed ; not that of the assassins or parchment-mongers of Rome.¹ In consequence, both of them being excommunicated in several councils, they treated the sentence with ridicule. Notwithstanding these circumstances, there were many things praiseworthy in the emperor : he was eloquent, of great abilities, well-read, actively charitable ; had many good qualities, both of mind and person ; was ever prepared for war, insomuch that he was sixty-two times engaged in battle ; was equitable in adjusting differences : and when matters were unsuccessful, he would pour out his griefs to heaven, and wait for redress from thence. Many of his enemies perished by untimely deaths.

² Calixtus became pope on the 1st of February, 1119, and died on the 12th or 13th of December, 1124.

Story of the Man who was eaten by Mice.

§ 290. I have heard a person of the utmost veracity relate, that one of his adversaries, a weak and factious man, while reclining at a banquet, was on a sudden so completely surrounded by mice, as to be unable to escape : so great was the number of these little animals, that there could scarcely be imagined more in an whole province. It was in vain that they were attacked with clubs and fragments of the benches which were at hand ; and though they were for a long time assailed by all, yet they wreaked their deputed curse on no one else ; pursuing him only, with their teeth and with a kind of dreadful squeaking. And although he was carried out to sea about a javelin's cast by the servants, yet he could not by this means escape their violence ; for immediately so great a multitude of mice took to the water, that you would have sworn the sea was strewed with chaff. But when they began to gnaw the planks of the ship, and the water, rushing through the chinks, threatened inevitable shipwreck, the servants turned the vessel to the shore. The animals then also swimming close to the ship, landed first. Thus the wretch, set on shore, and soon after entirely gnawed in pieces, satiated the dreadful hunger of the mice.

Another Legend.

§ 291. I deem this the less wonderful, because it is well known, in Asia, that if a leopard bite any person, a party of mice approach directly to discharge their urine on the wounded man ; and that a filthy deluge of their water attends his death ; but if, by the care of servants driving them off, the destruction can be avoided during nine days, then medical assistance, if called in, may be of service. My informant had seen a person wounded after this manner, who, despairing of safety on shore, proceeded to sea, and lay at anchor; when immediately a multitude of mice swam out, wonderful to relate, in the rinds of pomegranates, the insides of which they had eaten; but they were drowned through the exertions of the sailors; for the Creator of all things has left nothing He has made destitute of sagacity, nor any pest without its remedy.

§ 292. During this emperor's reign flourished Marianus Scotus,¹ first a monk of Fulda, afterwards a recluse at Mentz, who, by renouncing the present life, secured the happiness of that which is to come. During his long continued leisure, he examined the writers on chronology, and discovered the disagreement of the cycles of Dionysius the Little with the Evangelical computation: so reckoning every year from the beginning of the world, he added twenty-two, which were wanting, to the above-mentioned cycles; but he had few or no followers of his opinion. Wherefore I am often led to wonder, why such unhappiness should attach to the learned of our time, that in so great a number of scholars and students, pale with watching, scarcely one can obtain unqualified commendation for knowledge. So much does ancient custom please, and so little encouragement, though deserved, is given to new discoveries, however consistent with truth: all are anxious to grovel in the old track, and everything modern is contemned; and therefore, as patronage alone can foster genius, when that is withheld, every exertion grows languid.

Account of a Miracle which happened in the Monastery of Fulda.

§ 293. But as I have mentioned the monastery of Fulda, I will relate what a reverend man, Walker, prior of Malvern, (whose words if any disbelieve he offends against holiness,) told me had happened there. "Not more than fifteen years have elapsed," said he, "since a contagious disease attacked the abbot of that place, and afterwards destroyed many of the monks. The survivors, at first, began each to fear for himself, and to pray and give alms more abundantly than usual: in process of time, however, for such is the nature of man, their fear gradually subsiding, they began to omit them; the cellarer more especially, who publicly and absurdly exclaimed, that the stock of provision was not adequate to such a consumption; that he had lately hoped for some reduction of expense from so many funerals, but that his hopes were at an end, if the dead consumed what the living could not. It happened on a certain night, when, from some urgent business, he had deferred going to rest for a long time, that having at length despatched every concern, he went towards the dormitory. And now you shall hear a strange circumstance : he saw in the chapter-house the abbot, and all who had died that year, sitting in the order they departed ; when affrighted and endeavouring to escape, he was detained by force. Being reproved and corrected, after the monastic manner, with a scourge, he heard the abbot speak precisely to the following effect : That it was foolish to look for advantage by another's death, when all were subject to one common fate ; that it was an impious thing, that a monk who had passed his whole life in the service of the church should be grudged the pittance of a single year after his death ; that he himself should die very shortly, but that whatever others might do for him, should redound only to the advantage of those whom he had defrauded ; that he might now go and correct, by his example, those whom he had corrupted by his expressions. He departed, and demonstrated that he had seen nothing imaginary, as well by his recent stripes, as by his death, which shortly followed.

§ 294. In the mean time, while employed on other subjects, both matter and inclination have occurred for the relation of what was determined in William's time, concerning the controversy still existing between the archbishops of Canterbury and York. And that posterity may be fully informed of this business, I will subjoin the opinions of the ancient fathers.

EXTRACTS SHEWING THAT EVERY BISHOP THROUGHOUT BRITAIN

Pope Gregory to Augustine, first Archbishop of Canterbury.

§ 295. " Let your jurisdiction not only extend over the bishops you shall have ordained, or such as have been ordained by the bishop of York, but also over all the priests of Britain, by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Boniface to Justus, Archbishop of Canterbury.

§ 296. " Far be it from every Christian, that anything concerning the city of Canterbury be diminished or changed, in present or future times, which was appointed by our predecessor pope Gregory, however human circumstances may be changed : but more especially by the authority of St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, we command and ordain, that the city of Canterbury shall ever hereafter be esteemed the metropolitan see of all Britain ; and we decree and appoint immutably, that all the provinces of the kingdom of England shall be subject to the metropolitan church of the aforesaid see. And if any one attempt to injure this church, which is more especially under the power and protection of the holy Roman church, or to lessen the jurisdiction conceded to it, may God expunge him from the book of life ; and let him know, that he is bound by the sentence of a curse."

Alexander to William, King of England.

§ 297. " The cause of Alric, formerly called bishop of Chichester, we have entrusted to our brother, bishop Lanfranc, to be by him diligently reconsidered and determined. We have also commended to him the labour of deciding the dispute which has arisen between the archbishop of York and the bishop of Dorchester, on matters belonging to their dioceses; strictly ordering him to examine this cause most diligently and bring it to a just termination. Besides, we have so fully committed to him the authority of our personal and pontifical power in considering and settling causes, that whatever he shall, according to justice, have determined, shall be regarded as firm and indissoluble hereafter, as though it had been adjudged in our presence."¹

EVIDENCE THAT THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK AND HIS SUFFRAGANS ARE SUBJECT TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

A General English Council concerning the Jurisdiction and Primacy of the Church of Canterbury.

§ 298. "In the year of our Lord Jesus Christ's Incarnation one thousand and seventy-two, of the pontificate of pope Alexander the eleventh, and of the reign of William, glorious king of England, and duke of Normandy, the sixth; by the command of the said pope Alexander, and permission of the same king, in presence of himself, his bishops, and abbots, the question was agitated concerning the primacy which Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, claimed in right of his church over that of York; and concerning the ordination of certain bishops, of which it was not clearly evident to whom they especially appertained; and at length, after some time it was proved and shewn by the distinct authority of various writings, that the church of York ought to be subject to that of Canterbury, and to be obedient to the appointments of its archbishop, as primate of all England, in all such matters as pertained to the Christian religion. But the homage of the bishop of Durham, that is of Lindisfarn, and of all the countries beyond the limits of the bishop of Litchfield, and the great river Humber, to the farthest boundaries of Scotland, and whatever on this side of the aforesaid river justly pertains to the diocese of the church of York, the metropolitan of Canterbury allowed for ever to belong to the archbishop of York and his successors; in such sort however, that if the archbishop of Canterbury chose to call a council, wherever he deemed fit, the archbishop of York was bound to be present at his command, with all his suffragan bishops, and be obedient to his canonical injunctions. And Lanfranc the archbishop proved from the ancient custom of his predecessors, that the archbishop of York was bound to make profession, even with an oath, to the archbishop of Canterbury, but through regard to the king, he dispensed with the oath from Thomas, archbishop of York; and received his written profession only : but not thereby forming a precedent for such of his successors as might choose to exact the oath, together with the profession, from Thomas's successors. If the archbishop of Canterbury should die, the archbishop of York shall come to Canterbury; and, with the other bishops of the church aforesaid, duly consecrate the person elected, as his lawful primate. But if the archbishop of York shall die, his successor, accepting the gift of the archbishopric from the king, shall come to Canterbury, or where the archbishop of Canterbury shall appoint, and shall from him receive canonical ordination. To this ordinance consented the king aforesaid, and the archbishops, Lanfranc of Canterbury, and Thomas of York; and Hubert subdeacon of the holy Roman church, and legate of the aforesaid pope Alexander; and the other bishops and abbots present. This cause was first agitated at the festival of Easter in the city of Winchester, in the royal chapel, situated in the castle; afterwards in the royal town called Windsor, where it received its termination, in the presence of the king, the bishops, and abbots of different orders, who were assembled at the king's court on the festival of Pentecost. The signature of William the king: the signature of Matilda the queen. I, Hubert, subdeacon of the holy Roman church, and legate from pope Alexander, have signed. I, Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, have signed. I, Thomas, archbishop of York, have signed. I, William, bishop of London, have assented. I, Herman, bishop of Shireburn, have signed. I, Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, have signed. I, Walter, bishop of Hereford, have assented. I, Giso, bishop of Wells, have assented. I, Remigius, bishop of Dorchester, have signed. I, Walkelin, bishop of Winchester, have signed. I, Herefast, bishop of Helmham, have signed. I, Stigand, bishop of Chichester, have assented. I, Siward, bishop of Rochester, have assented. I, Osbern, bishop of Exeter, have assented. I, Odo, bishop of Baieux, and earl of Kent, have assented. I, Geoffrey, bishop of Coutances, and one of the nobles of England, have assented. I, Scotland, abbot of St. Augustine's monastery, have assented. I, Elfwin, abbot of the monastery of Ramsey, have assented. I, Elnoth, abbot of Glastonbury, have assented. I, Thurstan, abbot of the monastery which is situate in the isle of Ely, have assented. I, Wulnoth, abbot of Chertsey, have assented. I, Elfwin, abbot of Evesham, have assented. I, Frederic, abbot of St. Alban's, have assented. I, Gosfrid, abbot of the monastery of St. Peter, near London, have assented. I, Baldwin, abbot of St. Edmund's monastery, have assented. I, Turol, abbot of Peterborough, have assented. I, Adelem, abbot of Abingdon, have assented. I, Ruald, abbot of the Newminster at Winchester, have assented."

§ 299. "It becomes every Christian to be subject to Christian laws, and by no means to run counter to those things which have been wholesomely enacted by the holy fathers. For hence arise strifes, dissensions, envyings, contentions, and other things, which plunge the lovers of them into eternal punishment. And the more exalted the rank of any person is, so much the more exact should be his obedience to divine commands : Wherefore I, Thomas, now ordained metropolitan bishop of the church of York, hearing and knowing your authorities, make unlimited profession of canonical obedience, to you, Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, and your successors ; and I promise to observe whatever shall be lawfully and canonically enjoined me, either by you or them. Of this matter I was doubtful, while I was yet about to be ordained by you ; wherefore I promised obedience unconditionally to you, but conditionally to your successors."

§ 300. The archbishop of Canterbury, as I remember to have observed in my first book,¹ originally had subject to him these bishops, London, Winchester, Rochester, Shireburn, Worcester, Hereford, Litchfield, Selsey, Leicester, Helmham, Sidnacester, Dunwich ; in the time of king Edward the Elder were added, Cornwall, Crediton, Wells in West Saxony, and Dorchester in Mercia, as I noticed in my second book.² The archbishop of York had all the bishops, on the farther side of the Humber, subject to him ; as Ripon, Hexham, Lindisfarn, Candida Casa, which is now called Whithern, and all the bishops of Scotland and the Orkneys, as the archbishop of Canterbury and those of Ireland and Wales. The bishoprics of Ripon and Hexham have long since perished by hostile ravages ; Leicester, Sidnacester, and Dunwich, by means that I cannot account for ; and, in the time of king Edward the Simple, Cornwall and Crediton were united, and the bishopric translated to Exeter. In king William's time, at this council, it was determined that according to the decrees of the canons the bishops should quit the villages, and fix their abode in the cities of their dioceses ; Lichfield therefore migrated to Chester, which was anciently called the City of Legions, Selsey to Chichester, Helmham first to Thetford, and now, by bishop Herbert, to Norwich ; Shireburn to Salisbury, Dorchester to Lincoln. For Lindisfarn had long before passed to Durham, and, lately, Wells to Bath.

§ 301. In this assembly, Lanfranc, who was yet uninstructed in English matters, inquired of the elder bishops, what was the order of sitting in council, as originally appointed. They, alleging the difficulty of the question, deferred their answer till the next day ; when, carefully calling circumstances to mind, they asserted that they had seen the arrangement as follows : that the archbishop of Canterbury, presiding at the council, should have on the right hand the archbishop of York, and next him the bishop of Winchester ; and on his left the bishop of London ; but should it ever happen that the primate of Canterbury should be unavoidably absent, or should he be dead, the archbishop of York, presiding at the council, should have the bishop of London on his right hand, and of Winchester on his left ; and the rest should take their seats according to the time of their ordination.

§ 302. At that time, too, the claim of the archbishop of York on the sees of Worcester and Dorchester was decided and set at rest ;—(for he said that they ought to be subject to his jurisdiction :)

which, after having pondered for some time in secret, when he proceeded to Rome with Lanfranc to receive their palls from the pope, he brought publicly before the Roman court. Lanfranc, though for the most part unmoved by injury, could not help betraying, by his countenance, his emotion at such a wanton and unheard-of attack, though he for some time refrained from speaking. But pope Alexander, who felt much for Lanfranc's distress, (for he had even condescendingly risen from his seat when he approached, professing that he paid him this mark of respect, not from honour to him as archbishop but regard to his learning,) removed from himself the unpleasant task of deciding, referring the adjudication of it to an English council. In consequence, as I have related, the matter, after deep investigation, came to this termination in the present council; that, as these bishops were on this side of the Humber, they should belong to Canterbury; but all beyond that river, to York.

§ 303. Here the pious simplicity of St. Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, and his noble confidence in God, demand praise and approbation. For when called in question, as well concerning this business, as on his slender attainments in learning, he had retired to consider more carefully what answer he should make, his mind undisturbed by tumult: "Believe me," said he, "we have not yet sung the service for the sixth hour; let us sing the service therefore." And, on his companions suggesting the necessity of first expediting the business they had met upon; that there was ample time for singing, and that the king and the nobility would laugh at them, if they heard of it; "Truly," said he, "let us first do our duty towards God, and afterwards settle the disputes of men." Having sung the service, he directly proceeded towards the council chamber, without devising any subterfuge, or any attempt to disguise the truth. To his dependents, who were desirous of withholding him, and who could not be persuaded but their cause was in danger, he said, "Know for certain, that I here visibly perceive those holy archbishops, Dunstan of Canterbury, and Oswald of York; who, defending me this day with their prayers, will darken the understandings of my gainsayers." Then giving his benediction to a monk, a man of little eloquence, but somewhat acquainted with the Norman language, on summing up his cause, he obtained, that he, who was before thought unworthy of the management of his own diocese, should be humbly entreated by the archbishop of York to condescend to visit those parts of his province, which he himself, through dread of enemies, or ignorance of the language, had refrained from approaching.

§ 304. But I will no longer torture the patience of my readers, who perhaps do not regard this matter with pleasure, as they are in expectation of the history of William's successors; though, if I am not too partial to myself, a variety of anecdote can be displeasing to no one, unless he be morose enough to rival the superciliousness of Cato. But whoever is so inclined will find such other matters in the fourth and fifth book; for here the third shall terminate.

PREFACE TO BOOK IV.

I AM aware, that many persons think it unwise in me, to have written the history of the kings of my own time, alleging that in a work of such a description, truth is often made shipwreck of, while falsehood meets with support; because to relate the crimes of contemporaries is attended with danger, their good actions with applause. Whence it arises, say they, that, as all things have now a natural tendency to evil rather than to good, the historian passes over any disgraceful transaction, however obvious, through timidity; and, for the sake of approbation, feigns the existence of good qualities when he cannot find them. There are others, who, judging of us by their own indolence, deem us unequal to so great a task, and brand our undertaking with malignant censure. Wherefore, impelled by the reasoning of the one, or the contempt of the other, I had long since voluntarily retired to leisure and to silence; but, after indulging in them for a time, the accustomed inclination for study again strongly beset me; as it was impossible for me to be unoccupied, and I knew not how to give myself up to those external avocations, which are beneath the notice of a literary character. To this must be added the incitements of my friends, to whose suggestions, though only implied, I ought to pay regard; and they indeed gently urged me, already sufficiently disposed, to prosecute my undertaking. Animated, therefore, by the advice of those whom I love most affectionately, I advance to give them a lasting pledge of friendship from the stores of my research. Grateful also to those who are in fear for me, lest I should either excite hatred, or disguise the truth, I will, by the help of Christ, make such a return for their kindness, as neither to become odious, nor a falsifier. For I will describe, both what has been done well, or otherwise, in such wise, that, safely steering, as it were, between Scylla and Charybdis, my opinions shall not be concealed, though some matters may be omitted in my history. Moreover, to those who undervalue the labours of others, I make the same answer as St. Jerome formerly did to his critics; "Let them read if they like; if not, let them cast it aside;" because I do not obtrude my work on the fastidious, but I dedicate it to the studious, if any think it worthy of their notice; a matter which even these men will readily pronounce to be consonant to equity, unless they are of the number of those, of whom it is said, "Fools are easy to confute, but not so easy to restrain." I will relate, then, in this, the fourth book of my work, everything which may be said of William, the son of William the Great, in such manner, that neither shall the truth suffer, nor shall the dignity of the prince be obscured. Some matters also will be inserted in these pages, which in his time were calamitous in this country, or glorious elsewhere, as far as my knowledge extends: more especially, the pilgrimage of the Christians to Jerusalem, which it will be proper to annex in this place; because an expedition so famous in these times is well worth hearing, and will also be an incitement to valour. Not indeed that I have any confidence these transactions will be better treated by me than by others who have written on the subject ; but that, what many write, many may read. Yet, lest so long a preface should disgust my reader, I will immediately enter on my work.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S

Of King William Rufus, son of King William the First.

§ 305. WILLIAM then, the son of William, was born in Normandy many years before his father came to England, and being educated with extreme care by his parents, as he had naturally an ambitious mind he at length reached the summit of dignity. He would no doubt have been a prince incomparable in our time, had not his father's greatness eclipsed him ; and had not the fates cut short his years too early for his maturer age to correct such errors as had been contracted by the licentiousness of power and the impetuosity of youth. When childhood was passed, he spent the period of youth in military occupations ; in riding, throwing the dart, contending with his elders in obedience, with those of his own age in action ; esteeming it injurious to his reputation, if he were not the foremost to take arms in military commotions ; unless he were the first to challenge the adversary, or when challenged, to overcome him. To his father he was ever dutiful, always exerting himself in his sight in battle, ever at his side in peace. His hopes gradually expanding, he already aspired after the succession, especially on the abdication¹ of his elder brother, while the tender age of the younger gave him no uneasiness. Thus, adopted as his successor by his father during his last illness, he set out to take possession of the kingdom ere the king had breathed his last ; where being gladly received by the people, and obtaining the keys of the treasury, he by these means subjected all England to his will. Archbishop Lanfranc, who had educated him and made him a knight,² favoured his pretensions ; by whose authority and assistance he was crowned on the day of Saints Cosmas and Damian,³ and passed the remainder of the winter quietly and with general favour.

² At this period the custom of receiving knighthood from the hands of bishops or abbots yet obtained. There is a law of Henry I. prohibiting abbots from making knights.

³ The feast of Saints Cosmas and Damian is the 27th of September. Florence of Worcester and other authorities state that William was crowned on Sunday, the 26th of September. According to the Saxon Chronicle it was "three days before Michaelmas day."

How King Rufus overcame his Opponents.

§ 306. At the expiration of this period, in the beginning of spring,¹ his first contention was with his uncle, Odo, bishop of Baieux. For when he, on his release from confinement, as I have related, had firmly established his nephew, Robert, in the duchy of Normandy, he came to England, and received from the king the earldom of Kent.² But when he saw everything in the kingdom managed, not at his own pleasure, as formerly, (for the administration of public affairs was now committed to William,³ bishop of Durham,) moved with envy, he himself revolted from the king, and tainted many others by insinuating that the kingdom belonged to Robert, who was of gentler disposition, and whose youthful follies had been corrected by many adversities; that William, delicately brought up, and overbearing from that ferocity of mind which was manifest in his countenance, would dare everything, in defiance of right and equity; that it must soon come to pass, that they would lose the honours they had already obtained with so much difficulty; that nothing was gained by the father's death, if those whom he had cast into prison were to be killed by the son. To this effect he used, at first, secretly to whisper, together with Roger Montgomery, Geoffrey, bishop of Coutances,⁴ with his nephew Robert earl of Northumberland and others; afterwards they were more open in their clamours, repeating and disseminating them by letters and by emissaries. Moreover, even William bishop of Durham, the confidential minister of the king, had joined in their treachery; which was a matter of great concern to William, it is said; because, together with the breach of friendship, he was disappointed of the resources of the distant provinces. Odo now carried off booty of every kind to Rochester, plundering the king's revenues in Kent, and especially the lands of the archbishop; breathing eternal hatred against him, because, he said, it was by his advice that his brother had cast him into chains. Nor was this assertion false; for when William the Elder formerly complained to Lanfranc, that he was deserted by his brother; "Seize, and cast him into chains," said he. "What!" replied the king, "he is a clergyman." Then the archbishop with playful archness, as Persius says,⁵ "balancing the objection with nice antithesis," rejoined, "you will not seize the bishop of Baieux, but confine the earl of Kent." Bishop Geoffry with his nephew, depopulating Bath and Berkeley, and part of the county of Wilts, treasured up their spoils at Bristol. Roger Montgomery sending out his army with the Welsh from

Shrewsbury, plundered Worcestershire ; and then attacked Worcester, when the king's soldiers who guarded it, though few in number, relying on the blessing of bishop Wulstan, to whom the custody of the castle was committed, dispersed this multitude ; and after wounding and killing many, took some of them prisoners. Moreover, Roger Bigot at Norwich, and Hugo de Grentemesnil at Leicester, each with their party, were plundering in their respective neighbourhoods. In vain, however, did the whole power of revolt rage against a man, who was deficient neither in prudence nor in good fortune. For seeing almost all the Normans leagued in one furious conspiracy, he sent persuasive letters, summoning to him such brave and honest English as yet remained ; and complaining to them on the subject of his wrongs, he bound them to his party, by promising them wholesome laws, a diminution of tribute, and free leave to hunt.¹ With equal cunning he circumvented Roger Montgomery, when riding with him, with dissembled perfidy ; for taking him aside, he loaded him with odium, saying, that he would willingly retire from the government, if it seemed meet to him, and to the rest whom his father had left as his guardians ; that he could not understand why they were so outrageous ; if they wanted money, they might have what they pleased ; if an increase of their estates, they might have that also ; in short, they might have whatever they chose ; only let them be careful that the judgment of his father was not called in question ; for, if they thought it ought to be disregarded in the instance of himself, it might be a bad example for them ; for the same person made him king who had made them earls. Influenced by these words and promises, the earl, who, next to Odo, had been the chief leader of the faction, was the first to desert. Proceeding, therefore, immediately against the rebels, he laid siege to the castles of his uncle at Tunbridge and at Pevensey, and seizing him in the latter, compelled him to swear, as he dictated, that he would depart from England and deliver up Rochester. To fulfil this promise he sent him forward with a party he could rely on, intending to follow at his leisure. At that time almost all the young nobility of England and Normandy were at Rochester : three sons of earl Roger, Eustace the younger of Boulogne, and many others not deserving notice. The royal party accompanying the bishop were few and unarmed,—for who could fear treachery where he was present ? and going round the walls, they called to the townsmen to open the gates, for so the bishop in person and the absent king commanded. Observing from the wall, however, that the countenance of the bishop ill agreed with the language of the speakers, they suddenly sallied out, took horse in an instant, and carried away captive the bishop and the whole party. The report of this transaction quickly reached the king. Fierce from the injury, and smothering his indignation, he called together his English subjects, and ordered them to summon all their countrymen to the siege, unless any wished to be branded with the name of “ Nothing.”² which implies "rascal." The English, who thought nothing more disgraceful than to be stigmatized by such an appellation, flocked in troops to the king, and rendered his army invincible. Nor could the townsmen longer delay submission, finding that a party, however noble or however numerous, could avail nothing against the king of England. Odo, now taken a second time, abjured England for ever: the bishop of Durham, of his own accord, retired beyond sea, the king allowing him to escape uninjured, out of regard to his former friendship: the rest were all admitted to fealty. During the interval of this siege, some of the king's fleet destroyed a party which the earl of Normandy had sent to assist the traitors, partly by slaughter and partly by shipwreck; the remainder, intent on escaping, endeavoured to make sail, but being soon after disappointed by its falling calm, they became matter for laughter to our people, but their own destruction; for, that they might not be taken alive, they leaped from their vessels into the sea.

² Of this word Matt. Paris writes, “ ‘ Nothing,’ which is the same as ‘ Nequam ’ in Latin ;” and adds that the English consider nothing more contumelious or disgraceful than this vile word.

§ 307. The next year, as the sense of injuries ever grows keener from reconsideration, the king began carefully to examine how he might revenge his griefs and repay his brother for this insult. In consequence, by his practices, bribing the garrison, he obtained possession of the castle of St. Valery,¹ the adjoining port, and the town which is called Albemarle. The earl had not the courage to resist, but by means of ambassadors acquainted his lord, the king of France, with the violence of his brother, and begged his assistance. He, inactive, and belching from his daily surfeit, came hiccupping, through repletion, to the war; but, as he was making great professions, the money of the king of England met him by the way, with which his resolution being borne down, he unbuckled his armour and went back to his gormandizing. In this manner Normandy, for a long time, groaned under intestine war, sometimes one party, sometimes the other, being victorious: the nobility, men of fickle temper and faithful to neither brother, exciting their mutual fury. A few, better advised, attentive to their own advantage, for they had possessions in both countries, were mediators of a peace; the basis of which was, that the king should get possession of Maine for the earl, and the earl should cede to the king those castles which he already held, and the monastery of Fescamp. The treaty was ratified and confirmed by the oath of the nobles on both sides.

§ 308. Not long after, the king went abroad to execute these conditions. Each leader made great efforts to invade Maine; but when they had completed their preparations, and were just ready to proceed, an obstacle arose, through the spirit of Henry, the youngest brother, loudly remonstrating against their covetousness, which had shared their paternal possessions between themselves, and blushed not at having left him almost destitute. In consequence, he took possession of Mount St. Michael, and harassed, with constant sallies, the besieging forces of his brothers. During this siege, a noble specimen of disposition was exhibited, both by the king and by the earl; of compassion in the one, and of magnanimity in the other. I shall subjoin these instances, for the information of my readers.

§ 309. The king, going out of his tent, and observing the enemy at a distance, proudly prancing, rushed unattended against a large party; spurred on by the impetuosity of his courage, and at the same time confident that none would dare resist him. Presently his horse, which he had that day purchased for fifteen marks of silver, being killed under him, he was thrown down, and for a long time dragged by his foot; the strength of his mail, however, prevented him from being hurt. The soldier who had unhorsed him was at this instant drawing his sword to strike him, when, terrified at the extremity of his danger, William cried out, "Hold, rascal, I am the king of England." The whole troop trembled at the well-known voice of the prostrate monarch; and immediately, respectfully raising him from the ground, brought him another horse. Leaping into the saddle without waiting for assistance, and darting a keen look on the by-standers: "Who unhorsed me?" said he. While the rest were silent through fear, the bold perpetrator of the deed readily defended himself, saying, "'Twas I, who took you, not for a king, but for a soldier." Soothed, and regaining the serenity of his countenance, the king exclaimed, "By the Face at Lucca,"¹ (for such was his usual oath,) "henceforth thou shalt be mine, and, placed on my roll, shalt receive the recompense of this gallant deed." Nobly done, magnanimous king! what encomium shall I pass on this speech? Equal to Alexander the Great in glory; who, through admiration of his courage, preserved unhurt a Persian soldier who had attempted to strike him from behind, but was frustrated in his design by the treachery of his sword.

§ 310. But now to relate the humanity of the earl. When the blockade had so far proceeded that the besieged were in want of water, Henry sent messengers to Robert, to expostulate with him on the thirst he endured, and to represent, that it was impious to deprive him of water, the common right of mankind: let him try his courage another way, if he chose, and not employ the violence of the elements, but the valour of a soldier. On which, wrought upon by the natural tenderness of his disposition, he ordered his party to be more remiss in their duty where they kept guard, that his thirsty brother might not be deprived of water: which circumstance, when related to the king, who was always inclined to warmth of temper, made him say to the earl, "You well know how to carry on war indeed, who allow your enemies plenty of water; and pray, how shall we subdue them, if we indulge them in food and drink?" But he smiling, uttered this kind and truly laudable expression, "Oh shame! should I suffer my brother to die with thirst? and where shall we find another, if we lose him?" On this the king, deriding the mild temper of the man, put an end to the war without

§ 311. Leading immediately an expedition, first against the Welsh, and then against the Scots, he performed nothing worthy of his greatness ; but lost many of his soldiers, and had his sumpter-horses intercepted. And not only at that time, but frequently in Wales, was fortune unfavourable to him ; which may seem strange to any one, when the chance of war was generally on his side in other places. But it appears to me that the unevenness of the country, and the badness of the weather, as it assisted their rebellion, was also an impediment to his valour. But king Henry, who now reigns, a man of excellent talents, discovered a mode of counter-acting their designs ; which was, by stationing in their country the Flemings, to be a barrier to them, and constantly keep them within bounds. At that time, by the industry of earl Robert, who had long since gained the good graces of the Scot, the basis of a peace was laid between Malcolm and William. But various grounds of difference still existing on both sides, and justice wavering through their mutual animosity, Malcolm came of his own accord to Gloucester, earnestly soliciting peace, so that it were on equitable conditions : he obtained, however, nothing more than permission to return uninjured to his kingdom ; for the king disdained to take a man by subtlety, whom he might have conquered by arms. But the next winter he was dispatched by the party of Robert earl of Northumberland, rather through stratagem than force. When his wife, Margaret, a woman distinguished for alms-giving and for chastity, heard of his death, disgusted with life, she earnestly entreated of God to die. They were both remarkable for piety, but the queen more especially ; for during her whole life, wherever she might be, she had twenty-four poor persons whom she supplied with meat and clothing. In Lent, waiting for the singing of the priests, she used to watch all night in the church, herself assisting at triple mattins—of the Trinity, of the Cross, of St. Mary ; and afterwards repeating the Psalter ; with tears bedewing her garments, and agitating her breast. Departing from the church, she used to feed the poor ; first three, then nine, then twenty-four, at last three hundred : herself standing by with the king, and pouring water on their hands. Edgar his son, when expelled by his uncle, was restored by William ; assuredly with a noble compassion, and becoming so great a personage, who, forgetting the injuries of the father, replaced the son, when suppliant, on his throne.

§ 312. Greatness of soul was preeminent in the king, which in process of time he obscured by excessive severity ; vices, indeed, in place of virtues, so insensibly crept into his bosom, that he could not distinguish them. The world doubted, for a long time, to which side he would incline ; what tendency his disposition would take. At first, as long as archbishop Lanfranc survived, he abstained from every crime, so that it might be hoped he would be the very mirror of kings ; after his death, for a time, he showed himself so variable, that the balance hung even betwixt vices and virtues : at last, however, in his latter years, the desire after good grew cold, and the crop of evil increased to ripeness: his liberality became prodigality; his magnanimity pride; his austerity cruelty. I may be allowed, with permission of the royal majesty, not to conceal the truth: for he feared God but little, man not at all. If any one shall say this is undiscerning, he will not be wrong: because wise men should observe this rule, "God ought to be feared at all times; but man, according to circumstances." He was, when abroad, and in public assemblies, of supercilious look, darting his threatening eye on the by-stander; and with assumed severity and ferocious voice, assailing such as conversed with him. From apprehension of poverty, and of the treachery of others, as may be conjectured, he was too much given to lucre, and to cruelty. At home, and at table with his intimate companions, he gave loose to levity and to mirth. He was a most facetious railer at anything he had himself done amiss, in order that he might thus do away obloquy and make it matter of jest. But I shall dilate somewhat on that liberality, in which he deceived himself; and afterwards on his other propensities, that I may manifest what great vices sprang up in him under the semblance of virtues.

§ 313. For in fact, there are two kinds of givers: the one is denominated prodigal, the other liberal. The prodigal are such as lavish their money on those things, of which they will leave either a transient, or perhaps no memory at all in this world; neither will they gain mercy by them from God: the liberal are those who redeem the captive from the plunderer, assist the poor, or discharge the debts of their friends. We must give, therefore, but with discrimination and moderation; for many persons have exhausted their patrimony by giving inconsiderately. "For what can be more silly, than to take pains to be no longer able to do, that which you do with pleasure?"¹ Some, therefore, when they have nothing to give, turn to rapine, and get more hatred from those from whom they take, than good-will from those to whom they give. We lament that thus it happened to this king; for, when in the very beginning of his reign, through fear of tumults, he had assembled soldiers, and denied them nothing, promising still greater remuneration hereafter, the consequence was, that as he had soon exhausted his father's treasures, and had then but moderate revenues, his substance failed, though the spirit of giving remained, which by habit had almost become nature. He was a man who knew not how to take off from the price of anything, or to judge of the value of goods; but the trader might sell him his commodity at whatever rate, or the soldier demand any pay, he pleased. He was anxious that the cost of his clothes should be extravagant, and angry if they were purchased at a low price. One morning, indeed, while putting on his new boots, he asked his chamberlain what they cost; and when he replied, "Three shillings," indignantly and in a rage he cried out, "You son of a whore, how long has the king worn boots of so paltry a price? go, and bring me a pair worth a mark of silver." He went, and bringing him a much cheaper pair, told him, falsely, that they cost as much as he had ordered: "Ay," said the king, "these are suitable to royal majesty." Thus his chamberlain used to charge him what he pleased for his clothes; acquiring by this means many things for his own advantage.

§ 314. The fame of his generosity, therefore, pervaded all the West, and reached even to the East. Military men came to him out of every province on this side the mountains, whom he rewarded most profusely. In consequence, when he had no longer aught to bestow, poor and exhausted, he turned his thoughts to money-getting. The rapacity of his disposition was seconded by Ralph,¹ the inciter of his covetousness; a clergyman of the lowest origin, but raised to eminence by his wit and subtilty. If at any time a royal edict issued, that England should pay a certain tribute; it was doubled by this plunderer of the rich, this exterminator of the poor, this confiscator of other men's inheritance. He was an invincible pleader, as unrestrained in his words as in his actions: and equally furious against the meek as against the turbulent. Wherefore some people² used to laugh, and say, that he was the only man who knew how to employ his talents in this way, and cared for no one's hatred, so that he could please his master. At this person's suggestion, the sacred honours of the church, as the pastors died, were exposed to sale: for whenever the death of any bishop or abbot was announced, directly one of the king's clerks was despatched, who made an inventory of everything, and carried all future rents into the royal exchequer. In the meantime some person was sought out, fit to supply the place of the deceased; not from proof of morals, but of money; and at last, if I may so say, the empty honour was conferred, and even that purchased at a great price. These things appeared the more disgraceful, because in his father's time, after the decease of a bishop or abbot, all rents were reserved entire, to be given up to the succeeding pastor; and persons truly meritorious on account of their religion were elected. But in the lapse of a very few years, everything was changed. There was no man rich, except the money-changer; no clerk unless he was a lawyer; no priest unless (to use an expression hardly Latin) he was a farmer. Men of the meanest condition, or guilty of whatever crime, were listened to, if they could suggest anything likely to be advantageous to the king: the halter was loosened from the robber's neck, if he could promise any emolument to the sovereign. All military discipline being relaxed,³ the courtiers preyed upon the property of the country people, and consumed their substance by taking the very meat from the mouths of these wretched creatures. Then was their flowing hair and extravagant dress, and then was invented the fashion of shoes with curved points:⁴ then the model for young men was to rival women in delicacy of person, to mince their gait, to walk with loose gesture and half-naked. Enervated and effeminate, they unwillingly remained what nature had made them; the assailers of others' chastity, prodigal of their own.¹ Troops of pathicks and droves of harlots followed the court, so that it was said, with justice, by a wise man, that England would be fortunate if Henry could reign; led to such an opinion, because he abhorred obscenity from his youth.

§ 315. Here, were it necessary, I could add, that archbishop Anselm attempted to correct these abuses; but failing of the co-operation of his suffragans, he voluntarily quitted the kingdom; yielding to the depravity of the times. Anselm, than whom none ever was more tenacious of right; none in the present time so thoroughly learned; none so completely spiritual; the father of his country, the mirror of the world: he, when just about to set sail, after waiting in port for a wind, was rifled, as though he had been a public robber; all his bags and packages being brought out and ransacked. Of this man's injuries I could speak farther, had the sun witnessed anything more unjust than this single transaction, or were it not necessary to omit a relation, which has been anticipated by the eloquence of the very reverend Edmer.²

§ 316. Hence may be perceived how fierce a flame of evil burst forth from what the king conceived to be liberality. In repressing which, as he did not manifest so much diligence as negligence, he incurred a degree of infamy, not only great, but scarcely to be wiped out: I think undeservedly, however, because he never could have exposed himself to such disgrace, had he only recollected the dignity of his station. I pass over, therefore, these matters slightly, and hasten in my composition, because I blush to relate the crimes of so great a king; rather giving my attention to refute and extenuate them.

§ 317. The Jews in his reign gave proof of their insolence towards God: at one time, at Rouen, endeavouring to prevail on some converts, by means of presents, to return to Judaism;³ at p. 682; who also observes that the first improver, by adding the long curved termination, was a fellow (quidam nebulo) in the court of William Rufus, named Robert.

² Eadmer, besides making constant mention of Anselm in his Historia Novorum, wrote his Life, also, in a separate form, of which a translation will appear in the present series.

³ The MSS. C. D. & E. followed by Saville, agree with the text; but A. and L. here insert a story (borrowed from Eadmer, Hist. Novor. p. 47) to the following effect:—"A Jewish youth imagined that St. Stephen had appeared to him, and commanded him to be baptized: this he obeyed. His father immediately flew to the king, earnestly entreating an order for his son to be restored to the faith of his ancestors. The king not discovering any advantage as likely to accrue to himself, remained silent: on this the Jew offered him sixty marks, on condition that he would restore his son to Judaism. William then ordered the youth to be brought before him; related his father's complaint, and commands him to renounce his baptism. The lad, astonished, replied, 'Your majesty is joking surely.' 'I joke with thee,' exclaimed the king, 'thou son of ordure! begone, and obey my commands instantly, or by the face at Lucca, I will have thine eyes torn out.' The young man remaining inflexible, he drove him from his presence. The father was then ordered before the king, who desired him to pay down the money he had promised; but, on the Jew's remonstrating that he had not reconverted his son, and the king's declaring that his labour was not to go unrewarded, it was agreed that he should receive half the sum."

another, at London, entering into controversy with our bishops : because the king (in jest, as I suppose) had said, that if they mastered the Christians in open argument, he would become one of their sect. The question therefore was agitated with much apprehension on the part of the bishops and clergy, fearful, through pious anxiety, for the Christian faith. From this contest, however, the Jews reaped nothing but confusion : though they used repeatedly to boast, that they were vanquished, not by argument, but by power.

§ 318. In later times, that is, about the ninth year of his reign, Robert earl of Normandy, at the admonition of pope Urban, as will be related hereafter, took the resolution of going to Jerusalem, and pawned Normandy to his brother, for the sum of ten thousand marks. In consequence, an edict for an intolerable tax was circulated throughout England. On this the bishops and abbots, in great numbers, went to court, to complain of the injury ; observing that they could not raise so great an impost, unless they drove away their wretched husbandmen altogether. To this the courtiers, with angry countenance, as usual, replied, “ Have you not shrines adorned with gold and silver, full of dead men’s bones ? ” deigning the petitioners no other answer. In consequence, perceiving the drift of the reply, they took off the gold from the shrines of their saints ; robbed their crucifixes ; melted their chalices ; not for the service of the poor, but of the king’s exchequer. For almost everything, which the holy parsimony of their ancestors had saved, was consumed by the rapacity of these freebooters.

§ 319. Just so, too, were their proceedings against their vassals ; first taking their money, then their land : neither the poor man’s poverty, nor the rich man’s abundance, protecting him. He so restricted the right of hunting, which he had formerly allowed, that it became a capital offence to take a stag. This extreme severity, which was tempered by no affability, was the cause of many conspiracies, among the nobility, against his safety : one of whom, Robert de Molbrei, earl of Northumberland, in consequence of very high words between him and the king, retired to his province, with the intention of making powerful efforts against his lord ; but William pursuing him, he was taken, and doomed to perpetual captivity. Another, William de Ou, being accused of treachery towards the king, challenged his accuser to single combat ; but being unable to justify himself in the duel, he was deprived of his sight, and castrated. The same accusation involved many innocent and honourable men ; among whom was William de Alderea, a man of handsome person, who had stood godfather¹ with the king. Being sentenced to be hanged, he made his confession to Osmund bishop of Salisbury, and was scourged at every church of the town. Parting his garments to the poor, he went naked to the gallows, often making upon the blood gush from his delicate flesh by falling on his knees upon the stones. He satisfied the minds of the bishop, and of the people who followed him to the place of punishment, by exclaiming, “ God help my soul, and deliver it from evil, as I am free from the charge of which I am accused : the sentence, indeed, passed upon me will not be revoked, but I wish all men to be certified of my innocence." The bishop then commending his soul to heaven, and sprinkling him with holy water, departed. At his execution, he manifested an admirable degree of courage ; neither uttering a groan before, nor even a sigh at the moment of his death.

§ 320. But still there are some proofs of noble magnanimity in the king, the knowledge of which I will not deny to posterity. As he was once engaged in hunting in a certain forest, a foreign messenger acquainted him that the city of Mans, which he had lately added to his dominions on the departure of his brother, was besieged. Unprepared as he was, he turned his horse instantly, and shaped his journey to the sea. When his nobles reminded him that it would be necessary to call out his troops and put them in array, "I shall see," said he, who will follow me: do you think I shall not have people enough? If I know the temper of the young men of my kingdom, they will even brave shipwreck to come to me." In this manner he arrived, almost unattended, at the sea coast. The sky at that time was overcast, the wind was contrary, and a tempest swept the surface of the deep. When he determined to embark directly, the mariners besought him to wait till the storm should subside and the wind be favourable. "Why," said William, "I have never heard of a king perishing by shipwreck: no, weigh anchor immediately, and you shall see the elements conspire to obey me." When the report of his having crossed the sea reached the besiegers, they hastily retreated. One Helias, the author of the commotion, was taken; to whom, when brought before him, the king said jocularly, "I have you, master." But he, whose haughty spirit, even in such threatening danger, knew not how to be prudent or to speak submissively, replied, "You have taken me by chance; if I could escape I know what I would do." At this William, almost beside himself with rage, and seizing Helias, exclaimed, "You scoundrel! and what would you do? Begone, depart, fly: I give you leave to do whatever you can; and by the Face at Lucca, if you should conquer me, I will ask no return for this favour." Nor did he falsify his word, but immediately suffered him to escape,¹ rather admiring than following the fugitive. Who could believe this of an unlettered man! And perhaps there may be some person who, from reading Lucan,² may falsely suppose that William borrowed these examples from Julius Cæsar; but he had neither inclination nor leisure to attend to learning; it was rather the innate warmth of his temper and his conscious valour, which prompted him to such expressions. And indeed, if our religion would allow it, as the soul of Euphorbus was formerly said to have passed into Pythagoras of Samos, so might it equally be asserted that the soul of Julius Cæsar had migrated into king William.

² Pharsalia, lib. ii. 515; v. 580.

§ 321. He began and completed one very noble edifice, the palace in London;¹ sparing no expense to manifest the greatness of his liberality. His disposition therefore the reader will be able to discover from the circumstances we have enumerated. Should any one be desirous, however, to know the make of his person: he is to understand that he was well set; his complexion florid, his hair yellow; of open countenance; different coloured eyes, varying with certain glittering specks; of astonishing strength, though not very tall, and his belly rather projecting; of no eloquence, but remarkable for an hesitation of speech, especially when angry. Many sudden and sorrowful accidents happened in his time, which I shall arrange singly, according to the years of his reign; chiefly vouching for their truth on the credit of the Chronicles.

§ 322. In the second year of his reign, on the third of the ides of August [11th Aug. A.D. 1089], a great earthquake terrified all England with an horrid spectacle; for all the buildings were lifted up, and then again settled as before. A scarcity of every kind of produce followed; the corn ripened so slowly, that the harvest was scarcely housed before the feast of St. Andrew [30th Nov.]

§ 323. In his fourth year [A.D. 1091], was a tempest of lightning, and a whirlwind: finally, on the ides of October [15th Oct.], at Winchelcumbe, a stroke of lightning beat against the side of the tower, with such force, that shattering the wall, where it joined to the roof, it opened a place wide enough to admit a man; entering there, it struck a very large beam, and scattered fragments of it over the whole church; moreover it cast down the head of the crucifix, with the right leg, and the image of St. Mary. A stench so noisome followed, as to be insufferable to the human nostril. At length, the monks, with auspicious boldness, entering, defeated the contrivances of the devil, by the sprinkling of holy water.

§ 324. But what could this mean? a matter before unknown in every age. A tempest of contending winds, from the south-east, on the sixteenth of the kalends of November [Oct. 17th], destroyed more than six hundred houses in London. Churches were heaped on houses, and walls on partitions. The tempest, proceeding yet farther, carried off altogether the roof of the church of St. Mary le Bow, and killed two men. Rafters and beams were whirled through the air, an object of surprise, to such as contemplated them from a distance; of alarm, to those who stood nigh, lest they should be crushed by them. For, four rafters, six and twenty feet long, were driven with such violence into the ground, that scarcely four feet of them were visible. It was curious to see how they had perforated the solidity of the public street, maintaining there the same position which they had occupied in the roof from the hand of the workman, until, on account of their inconvenience to passengers, they were cut off level with the ground, as they could not be otherwise removed.

§ 325. In his fifth year [A. D. 1092], a similar thunder-storm at Salisbury entirely destroyed the roof of the church-tower, and much injured the wall, only five days after Osmund the bishop, of famed memory, had consecrated it.

§ 326. In his sixth year [A. D. 1093], there was such a deluge from rain, and such incessant showers, as none had ever remembered. Afterwards, on the approach of winter, the rivers were so frozen, that they bore horsemen and wagons; and soon after, when the frost broke, the bridges were destroyed by the drifting of the ice.

§ 327. In his seventh year [A. D. 1094], agriculture was neglected, on account of the heavy tribute, which the king had levied while in Normandy; of which the immediate consequence was a famine. This also gaining ground, a mortality ensued, so general, that the dying wanted attendance, and the dead, burial. At that time, too, the Welsh, fiercely raging against the Normans, and depopulating the county of Chester and part of Shropshire, obtained Anglesey by force of arms.

§ 328. In his tenth year [A. D. 1097], on the kalends of October [Oct. 1], a comet appeared for fifteen days, turning its larger train to the east, and the smaller to the south-east. Other stars also appeared, darting, as it were, at each other. This was the year in which Anselm, that light of England, voluntarily escaping from the darkness of error, went to Rome.

§ 329. In his eleventh year [A. D. 1098], Magnus king of Norway, with Harold, son of Harold formerly king of England, subdued the Orkney, Mevanian, and other circumjacent isles; and was now obstinately bent against England from Anglesey. But Hugh earl of Chester and Hugh earl of Shrewsbury opposed him; and ere he could gain the continent, forced him to retire. Here fell Hugh of Shrewsbury, being struck from a distance with a fatal arrow.

§ 330. In his twelfth year [A. D. 1099] an excessive tide flowed up the Thames, and overwhelmed many villages, with their inhabitants.

§ 331. In his thirteenth year [A. D. 1100], which was the last of his life, there were many adverse events; but the most dreadful circumstance was, that the devil visibly appeared to men, in woods and secret places, and spoke to them as they passed by. Moreover, in the county of Berks, at the village of Hamstead,¹ a fountain so plentifully flowed with blood for fifteen whole days, that it discoloured a neighbouring pool. The king heard of it, and laughed; neither did he care for his own dreams, nor for what others saw concerning him.

§ 332. They relate many visions and predictions of his death, three of which, sanctioned by the testimony of credible authors, I shall communicate to my readers. Edmer, the historian of our times, noted for his veracity, says that Anselm, the noble exile, with whom all religion was also banished, came to Marcigny, that he might communicate his sufferings to Hugh, abbot of Clugny; where, when the conversation turned upon king William, the abbot aforesaid observed, "Last night that king was brought before God; and by a deliberate judgment, incurred the sad sentence of damnation." How he came to know this, he neither explained at the time, nor did any of his hearers ask: nevertheless, out of respect to his piety, not a doubt of the truth of his words remained on the minds of any present. Hugh led such a life and had such a character that all regarded his discourse and venerated his advice, as though an oracle from heaven had spoken. And soon after, the king being slain as we shall relate, there came a messenger to entreat the archbishop to resume his see.

§ 333. The day before the king died he dreamed that he was let blood by a surgeon, and that the stream, reaching to heaven, clouded the light and intercepted the day. Calling on St. Mary for protection, he suddenly awoke, commanded a light to be brought, and forbade his attendants to leave him. They then watched with him several hours until daylight. Shortly after, just as the day began to dawn, a certain foreign monk told Robert Fitz Hamo, one of the principal nobility, that he had that night dreamed a strange and fearful dream about the king: That he had come into a certain church, with menacing and insolent gesture, as was his custom, looking contemptuously on the standers-by; then violently seizing the crucifix he gnawed the arms, and almost tore away the legs; that the image endured this for a long time, but at length struck the king with its foot in such a manner that he fell backwards; from his mouth, as he lay prostrate, issued so copious a flame that the volumes of smoke touched the very stars. Robert, thinking that this dream ought not to be neglected, as he was intimate with him, immediately related it to the king. William, repeatedly laughing, exclaimed, "He is a monk, and dreams for money, like a monk; give him an hundred shillings." Nevertheless, being greatly moved, he hesitated a long while whether he should go out to hunt as he had designed; his friends persuading him not to suffer the truth of the dreams to be tried at his personal risk. In consequence he abstained from the chase before dinner, dispelling the uneasiness of his unregulated mind by serious business. They relate, that, having plentifully regaled that day, he soothed his cares with a more than usual quantity of wine. After dinner he went into the forest, attended by few persons; of whom the most intimate with him was Walter, surnamed Tirel,¹ who had been induced to come from France by the liberality of the king. This man alone had remained with him, while the others, employed in the chase, were dispersed as chance directed.—The sun was now declining, when the king, drawing his bow and letting fly an arrow, slightly wounded a stag which passed before him; and, keenly gazing, followed it, still running, a long time with his eyes, holding up his hand to keep off the power of the sun's rays. At this instant Walter, conceiving a noble exploit,—which was, while the king's attention was otherwise occupied, to transfix another stag which by chance came near him,—unknowingly, and without power to prevent it, O gracious God! pierced his breast with a fatal arrow. On receiving the wound the king uttered not a word; but breaking off the shaft of the weapon where it projected from his body, and then falling upon the wound, he accelerated his death. Walter immediately ran up, but as he found him senseless and speechless he leaped swiftly upon his horse, and escaped by spurring him to his utmost speed. Indeed there was none to pursue him, some conniving at his flight, others pitying him, and all intent on other matters. Some began to fortify their dwellings, others to plunder, and the rest to look out for a new king. A few countrymen conveyed the body, placed on a cart, to the cathedral at Winchester, the blood dripping from it all the way. Here it was committed to the ground within the tower, attended by many of the nobility, though lamented by few. Next year the tower fell; though I forbear to mention the different opinions¹ on this subject, lest I should seem credulous of trifles: more especially as the building might have fallen through imperfect construction, even though he had never been buried there. He died in the year of our Lord's incarnation one thousand one hundred, of his reign the thirteenth, on the fourth of the nones of August [Aug. 2], aged above forty years; forming mighty plans, which he would have brought to effect, could he have spun out the thread of fate, or broken through and disengaged himself from the violence of fortune. Such was the energy of his mind, that he was bold enough to promise himself any kingdom whatever. Indeed, the day before his death, being asked where he would keep his Christmas, he answered, In Poictou; because the earl of Poictou, wishing anxiously to go to Jerusalem, was said to be about to pawn his territory to him. Thus, not content with his paternal possessions, and allured by expectation of greater glory, he grasped at honours not pertaining to him. He was a man much to be pitied by the clergy, for throwing away the soul they laboured to save; to be beloved by stipendiary soldiers for the multitude of his gifts; but not to be lamented by the people, because he suffered their substance to be plundered. I remember no council being held in his time wherein the health of the church was strengthened through the correction of abuses. He hesitated a long time ere he bestowed ecclesiastical honours, either for the sake of emolument or of weighing desert: so that, on the day he died, he held in his own hands three bishoprics and twelve vacant abbeys. Besides, taking advantage of the schism between Urban in Rome and Guibert at Ravenna, he forbade the payment of the tribute¹ to the holy see; though he was more inclined to favour Guibert, because the ground and instigation of the discord between himself and Anselm was that this man, so dear to God, had pronounced Urban to be pope, the other an apostate.

§ 334. In his time began the Cistercian order, which is now both believed and asserted to be the surest road to heaven.² To speak of this order does not seem irrelevant to the work I have undertaken, since it redounds to the glory of England to have produced the distinguished man who was the author and promoter of that rule. To us he belonged, and in our schools passed the earlier part of his life. Wherefore, if we are not envious, we shall embrace his good qualities the more kindly, in proportion as we knew them more intimately: and, moreover, I am anxious to extol his praise, because it is a mark of an ingenuous mind to approve that virtue in others of which in yourself you regret the absence. He was named Harding, and born in England of no very illustrious parents. From his early years he was a monk at Shireburn; but when secular desires had captivated his youth, he grew disgusted with the monastic garb, and went first to Scotland and afterwards to France. Here, after some years exercise in the liberal arts, he became awakened to the love of God. For, when manlier years had put away childish things, he went to Rome with a clerk who partook of his studies; neither the length and difficulty of the journey, nor the scantiness of their means of subsistence by the way, preventing them, both as they went and returned, from singing, daily, the whole psalter. Indeed the mind of this celebrated man was already meditating the design which soon after, by the grace of God, he attempted to put in execution: for returning into Burgundy, he received the tonsure at Molesmes, a new and magnificent monastery, and readily admitted the first elements of the order, as he had formerly seen them; but when additional matters were proposed for his observance, such as he had neither read in the rule nor seen elsewhere, he began modestly, and as became a monk, to ask the reason of them, saying, "By reason the supreme Creator has made all things, by reason He governs all things, by reason the fabric of the world revolves, by reason even the planets move, by reason the elements are directed, and by reason, and by due regulation, our nature ought to conduct itself. But since, through sloth, she too often departs from reason, many laws were, long ago, enacted for her use; and latterly a divine rule has been promulgated by St. Benedict to bring back the deviations of nature to reason. In this, though some things are contained, the design of which I cannot fathom, yet I deem it necessary to yield to authority. And though reason and the authority of the holy writers may seem at variance, yet still they are one and the same. For since God hath created and restored nothing without reason, how can I believe that the holy fathers, no doubt strict followers of God, could command anything but what was reasonable, as if we ought to give credit to their bare authority. See then that you bring reason, or at least authority, for what you devise; although no great credit should be given to what is merely supported by human reason, because it may be combated with arguments equally forcible. Therefore, from that rule, which, equally supported by reason and authority, appears as if dictated by the spirit of all just persons, produce precedents; which if you fail to do, in vain shall you profess his rule whose regulations you disdain to comply with."

A similar allusion to the Cistercian order being the surest road to heaven may be seen in the prologue to Richard of Devizes: "Quanto cella Cartusie celsior sit et cœlo vicinior claustrum Wintoniæ."—Chrou. Ric. Divis. cur. Stevenson.

§ 335. Sentiments of this kind, spreading as usual from one to another, justly moved the hearts of such as feared God, "lest haply they should or had run in vain." The subject then being canvassed in frequent chapters, ended by bringing over the abbot himself to the opinion that all superfluous matters should be passed by, and merely the essence of the rule be observed. Two of the fraternity, therefore, of equal faith and learning, were elected, who, by vicarious examination, were to discover the intention of the founder's rule; and when they had discovered it, to propound it to the rest. The abbot diligently endeavoured to induce the whole convent to give their concurrence, but as it is difficult to eradicate from men's minds what has early taken root, since they reluctantly relinquish the first notions they have imbibed, almost the whole of them refused to accept the new regulations, because they were attached to the old. Eighteen only, among whom was Harding, also called Stephen, persevering in their holy determination, together with their abbot, left the monastery, declaring that the purity of the institution could not be preserved in a place where riches and gluttony warred against even the heart that was well-inclined. They came, therefore, to Citeaux, a situation formerly covered with woods, but now so conspicuous from the abundant piety of its monks, that it is not undeservedly esteemed conscious of the Divinity himself. Here, by the countenance of the archbishop of Vienne, who is now pope,¹ they entered on a labour worthy to be remembered and venerated to the end of time.

§ 336. Certainly many of their regulations seem severe, and more particularly these: They wear nothing made with furs or linen, nor even that finely-spun woollen garment, which we call Staminium;² neither breeches, unless when sent on a journey, which at their return they wash and put away. They have two tunics with cowls, but no additional garment in winter; though, if they think fit, in summer they may lighten their garb. They sleep clad and girded, and never after Mattins return to their beds: but they so order the time of Mattins, that it shall be light ere the Lauds³ begin ; so intent are they on their rule, that they think no jot or tittle of it should be disregarded. Directly after these hymns they sing the Prime : after which they go out to work for stated hours. They complete whatever labour or service they have to perform by day without any other light. No one is ever absent from the daily services, or from Complines, except the sick. The cellarer and hospitaller, after Complines, wait upon the guests, yet observing the strictest silence. The abbot allows himself no indulgence beyond the others : everywhere present, everywhere attending to his flock ; except that he does not eat with the rest, because his table is with the strangers and the poor. Nevertheless, be he where he may, he is equally sparing of food and of speech : for never more than two dishes are served, either to him or to his company ; lard and meat never but to the sick. From the ides of September till Easter, whatever festival may occur, they do not take more than one meal a day, except on Sunday. They never leave the cloister but for the purpose of labour ; nor do they ever speak, either there or elsewhere, save only to the abbot or prior. They pay unwearied attention to the canonical¹ services, making no addition to them, except the Vigil for the defunct. They use in their divine service the Ambrosian chants² and hymns, as far as they were able to learn them from Milan. While they bestow care on the stranger and the sick, they inflict intolerable mortifications on their own bodies, for the health of their souls.

§ 337. The abbot, at first, both encountered these privations with much alacrity himself, and compelled the rest to do the same. In process of time, however, the man repented ;³ for he had been delicately brought up, and could not well bear such continued scantiness of diet. The monks, whom he had left at Molesmes, getting intimation as to his design either by messages or letters, for it is uncertain which, drew him back to the monastery, by his obedience to the pope, for such was their pretext : compelling him to a measure, to which he was already extremely well disposed. For, as if wearied out by the pertinacity of their entreaties, he left the narrow confines of poverty, and resought his former magnificence. All followed him from Citeaux, who had gone thither with him, except eight. These, few in number, but great in virtue, appointed Alberic, one of their party, abbot, and Stephen, prior ; the former not surviving more than eight years, was, by the will of Heaven, happily called away. Then, doubtless by God's appointment, Stephen, though absent, was elected abbot ; the original contriver of the whole scheme ; the especial and celebrated ornament of our times. Sixteen abbeys which he has already completed, and seven which he has begun, are sufficient testimonies of his abundant merit. Thus, God speaking through him, as by a trumpet, he directs the people around him, both by word and deed, to heaven; acting fully up to his own precepts; affable in speech, pleasant in look, and with a mind always rejoicing in the Lord. Hence, openly, that noble joy of countenance; hence, secretly, that compunction, coming from above; because despising this state of a sojourner, he constantly desires to be in a place of rest. For these causes he is beloved by all; for God graciously imparts to the minds of other men, a love for that man whom He loves. Wherefore the inhabitant of that country esteems himself happy, if, through his hands, he can transmit his wealth to God. He receives much, indeed; but expending little on his own wants, or those of his flock, he immediately spends the rest on the poor, and in the building of monasteries: for the purse of Stephen is the public treasury of the indigent. A proof of his abstinence is, that you see nothing there, as in other monasteries, flaming with gold, blazing with jewels or glittering with silver. For as a Gentile says, "Of what use is gold to a saint?" We think it not enough in our holy vases, unless the ponderous metal be eclipsed by precious stones; by the flame of the topaz, the violet of the amethyst, and the green shade of the emerald; unless the sacerdotal robes wanton with gold; and unless the walls glisten with various coloured paintings, and through the reflection of the sun's rays upon the ceiling. These men, however, placing those things which mortals foolishly esteem the first, only in a secondary point of view, give all their diligence to improve their morals, and love pure minds more than glittering vestments; knowing that the best remuneration for doing well, is to enjoy a clear conscience. Moreover, if at any time the laudable kindness of the abbot either desires, or feigns a desire, to modify aught from the strict letter of the rule, they are ready to oppose such indulgence; saying, that they have no long time to live, nor shall they continue to exist so long as they have already done; that they hope to remain steadfast in their purpose to the end, and to be an example to their successors, who will transgress, if they should give way. And indeed through human weakness, the perpetual law of which is, that nothing attained even by the greatest labour can long remain unchanged, it will be so. But to comprise, in one sentence, all things which are, or can be said of them; the Cistercian monks, at the present day, are a model for all monks, a mirror for the diligent, a spur to the indolent.

² The Ambrosian Ritual prevailed pretty generally till the time of Charlemagne, who adopted the Gregorian. Durandus (V. l.) has a curious account of an experiment, on the result of which was founded the general reception of the latter, and the confining the former chiefly to Milan, the church of St. Ambrose.

The Translation of the three Bishoprics of Wells, Chester, and Thetford.

§ 338. At this time three sees in England were removed from their ancient situations: Wells to Bath, by John: Chester to Coventry, by Robert: Thetford to Norwich, by Herbert; all through greater ambition than ought to have influenced men of such eminence. Finally, to speak of the last first; Herbert, from his skill in adulation, surnamed Losinga,¹ from being abbot of Ramsey, purchased the bishopric of Thetford, while his father, Robert, surnamed as himself, was intruded on the abbey of Winchester. This man, then, was the great source of simony in England; having craftily procured, by means of his wealth, both an abbey and a bishopric: for he hoodwinked the king's solicitude for the church by his money, and whispered great promises to secure the favour of the nobility: whence a poet of those times admirably observes,

A monster in the church from Losing rose,
 Base Simon's sect, the canons to oppose.
Peter, thou'rt slow; see Simon soars on high;
 If present, soon thou'd'st hurl him from the sky.²
 Oh grief, the church is let to sordid hire,
 The son a bishop, abbot is the sire.
 All may be hoped from gold's prevailing sway,
 Which governs all things; gives and takes away;
 Makes bishops, abbots, basely in a day.

§ 339. Future repentance, however, atoned for the errors of his youth: he went to Rome, when he was of a more serious age, and there resigning the staff and ring which he had acquired by simony, had them restored through the indulgence of that most merciful see; for the Romans regard it both as more holy and more fitting, that the dues from each church should rather come into their own purse, than be subservient to the use of any king whatever. Herbert thus returning home, removed the episcopal see, which had formerly been at Helmam, and was then at Thetford, to a town celebrated for its trade and populousness, called Norwich. Here he settled a congregation of monks, famous for their numbers and their morals; purchasing everything for them out of his private fortune. For, having an eye to the probable complaints of his successors, he gave none of the episcopal lands to the monastery, lest they should deprive the servants of God of their subsistence, if they found anything given to them which pertained to their see. At Thetford, too, he settled Cluniac monks, because the members of that order, dispersed almost all over the world, are rich in worldly possessions, and of distinguished piety towards God. Thus by the great and extensive merit of his virtues, he shrouded the multitude of his former failings; and by his abundant eloquence and learning, as well as by his skill in secular affairs, he became a favourite also of the Roman pontiff. Herbert thus changed, became, (as Lucan observes of Curio,) "the changer and mover of all things;" and, as in the times of this king, he had been a pleader in behalf of simony, so was he, afterwards, its most strenuous opposer; nor did he suffer that to be done by others, which he lamented he had ever himself done through the presumption of juvenile ardour: ever having in his mouth, as they relate, the saying of St. Jerome, "We have erred when young; let us amend now we are old." Finally, who can sufficiently extol his conduct, who, though not a very rich bishop, yet built so noble a monastery; in which nothing remains to be desired, either in the beauty of the lofty edifice, the elegance of its ornaments, or in the piety and universal charity of its monks. These things soothed him with joyful hope while he lived, and when dead, if repentance be not in vain, conducted him to heaven.

§ 340. John was bishop of Wells ; a native of Touraine, and an approved physician, by practice, rather than education. On the death of the abbot of Bath, he easily obtained the abbey from the king, both because all things at court were exposed to sale, and his covetousness seemed palliated by some degree of reason, that so famed a city might be still more celebrated, by becoming the see of a bishop. He at first began to exercise his severity against the monks, because they were dull, and in his estimation barbarians ; taking away all the lands ministering to their subsistence, and furnishing them with but scanty provision by his lay dependents. In process of time, however, when new monks had been admitted, he conducted himself with more mildness ; and gave a small portion of land to the prior, by which he might, in some measure, support himself and his inmates. And although he had begun austere, yet many things were there by him both nobly entered on and completed, in decorations and in books ; and more especially, in a selection of monks, equally notable for their learning and kind offices. But still he could not, even at his death, be softened far enough totally to exonerate the lands from bondage ; leaving, in this respect, an example not to be followed by his successors.

§ 341. There was in the diocese of Chester a monastery, called Coventry, which, as I have before¹ related, the most noble earl Leofric, with his lady Godiva, had built ; so splendid for its gold and silver, that the very walls of the church seemed too scanty to receive the treasures, to the great astonishment of the beholders. This, Robert, bishop of the diocese, eagerly seized on, in a manner by no means episcopal ; stealing from the very treasures of the church wherewith he might fill the hand of the donor, beguile the vigilance of the pope, and gratify the covetousness of the Romans. Continuing there many years, he gave no proof of worth whatever : for, so far from rescuing the tottering roofs from ruin, he wasted the sacred treasures, and became guilty of peculation ; and the bishop might have been convicted of illegal exactions, had an accuser been at hand. He fed the monks on miserable fare, made no attempts to excite in them a love for their profession, and suffered them to reach only a very common degree of learning : lest he should make them delicate by sumptuous living, or strictness of rule and depth of learning should inspire them to oppose him. Contented therefore with rustic fare, and humble literary attainments, they deemed it enough if they could only live in peace. Moreover, at his death, paying little attention to the dictates of the canons, by which it is enacted that bishops ought to be buried in their cathedrals, he commanded himself to be interred, not at Chester, but at Coventry ; leaving to his successors by such a decision the task, not of claiming what was not due to them, but, as it were, of vindicating their proper right.

§ 342. Here, while speaking of the times of William, I should be induced to relate the translation of the most excellent Augustine, the apostle of the English, and of his companions, had not the talents of the learned Goscelin¹ anticipated me; of Goscelin, who being a monk of St. Bertin, formerly came to England with Herman bishop of Salisbury, skilled equally in literature and music. For a considerable time visiting the cathedrals and abbeys, he left proofs of uncommon learning in many places. Second to none after Beda in the celebration of the English saints; next to Osberne too, he bore away the palm in music. Moreover he wrote innumerable lives of modern saints, and restored, in an elegant manner, such of those of the ancients as had been lost through the confusion of the times, or had been carelessly edited. He also so exquisitely wrought the process of this translation, that he may be said to have realized it to the present race, and given a view of it to posterity. Happy that tongue which ministered to so many saints! happy that voice which poured forth such melody! more especially as in his life his probity equalled his learning. But, as I have hitherto recorded disgraceful transactions of certain bishops, I will introduce other contemporaneous bishops of different lives and dispositions, that our times may not be said to have grown so dark as not to produce one single saint. Such as are desirous may find this promise completed in a subsequent book, after the narrative of king Henry's transactions.

§ 343. I shall now describe the expedition to Jerusalem, relating in my own words what was seen and endured by others. Besides, too, as opportunity offers, I shall select from ancient writers accounts of the situation and riches of Constantinople, Antioch, and Jerusalem, in order that he who is unacquainted with these matters, and meets with this work, may have something at hand to communicate to others. But for such a relation there needs a more fervent spirit, in order to complete effectually what I begin with such pleasure. Invoking, therefore, the Divinity, as is usual, I begin as follows.

§ 344. In the year of the Incarnation 1095, pope Urban the second, who then filled the papal throne, passing the Alps, came into France. The ostensible cause of his journey was, that, being driven from Rome by the violence of Guibert, he might prevail on the churches on this side the mountains to acknowledge him. His more secret intention was not so well known; this was, by Boamund's advice, to excite almost the whole of Europe to undertake an expedition into Asia, that in such a general commotion of all countries, auxiliaries might easily be engaged, by whose means both Urban might obtain Rome, and Boamund, Illyria and Macedonia. For Guiscard, his father, had conquered those countries from Alexis, and also all the territory extending from Durazzo to Thessalonica; wherefore Boamund claimed them as his due since he obtained not the inheritance of Apulia, which his father had given to his younger son, Roger. Still, nevertheless, whatever might be the cause of Urban's journey, it turned out of great and singular advantage to the Christian world. A council, therefore, was assembled at Clermont, which is the most noted city of Auvergne. The number of bishops and abbots was three hundred and ten. Here at first, during several days, a long discussion was carried on concerning the Catholic faith, and the establishment of peace among contending parties. For, in addition to those crimes in which every one indulged, all on this side of the Alps had arrived at such a calamitous state as to take each other captive on little or no pretence; nor were they suffered to go free, unless ransomed at an enormous price. Again, too, the snake of simony had so reared her slippery crest, and cherished, with poisonous warmth, her deadly eggs, that the whole world became infected with her mortal hissing, and tainted the honours of the church. At that time, I will not say bishops to their sees merely, but none aspired even to any ecclesiastical degree, except by the influence of money. Then, too, many persons putting away their lawful wives, procured divorces, and invaded the marriage-couch of others. Wherefore, as in both these cases, there was a mixed multitude of offenders, the names of some powerful persons were singled out for punishment. Not to be tedious, I will subjoin the result of the whole council, abbreviating some parts, in my own language.

§ 345. In a council at Clermont,¹ in the presence of pope Urban, these articles were enacted: "That the Catholic church shall be pure in faith, free from all servitude; that bishops, or abbots, or clergy of any rank, shall receive no ecclesiastical dignity from the hand of princes, or of any of the laity; that clergymen shall not hold prebends in two churches or cities; that no one shall be bishop and abbot at the same time; that ecclesiastical dignities shall be bought or sold by no one; that no person in holy orders shall be guilty of carnal intercourse; that such as not knowing the canonical prohibition had purchased canonries should be pardoned, but that they should be taken from such as were known to possess them by their own purchase, or that of their relations; that no layman from Ash Wednesday, no clergyman from Quadragesima to Easter shall eat flesh; that, at all times, the first fast of the Ember weeks should be in the first week of Lent; that orders should be conferred at all times on the evening of Saturday, or on a Sunday, continuing fasting;² that on Easter-eve, service should not be celebrated till after the ninth hour; that the second fast should be observed in the week of Pentecost; that from our Lord's Advent to the octave of the Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octaves of Easter, from the first day of the Rogations to the octaves of Pentecost, and from the fourth day of the week at sunset, at all times, to the second day in the following week at sunrise, the truce of God¹ be observed; that whoever laid violent hands on a bishop should be excommunicated; that whoever laid violent hands on clergymen or their servants should be accursed; that whoever seized the goods of bishops or clergymen at their deaths, should be accursed; that whoever married a relation, even in the seventh degree of consanguinity, should be accursed; that none should be chosen bishop except a priest, deacon, or subdeacon, who was of noble descent, unless under pressing necessity and licence from the pope; that the sons of priests and concubines should not be advanced to the priesthood, unless they first made their vow; that whosoever fled to the church or the cross should, being insured from loss of limb, be delivered up to justice, or if innocent, be released; that every church should enjoy its own tithes, nor convey them away to another; that laymen should neither buy nor sell tithes; that no fee should be demanded for the burial of the dead." In this council the pope excommunicated Philip, king of France, and all who called him king or lord, and obeyed him or spoke to him, unless for the purpose of correcting him; in like manner too his accursed consort and all who called her queen or lady, till they so far reformed as to separate from each other;² and also Guibert of Ravenna, who called himself pope; and Henry, emperor of Germany, who supported him.

§ 346. Afterwards a clear and forcible discourse, such as should come from a priest, was addressed to the people, on the subject of an expedition of the Christians against the Turks. This I have thought fit to transmit to posterity, as I have learned it from those who were present, preserving its sense unimpaired. For who can preserve the force of that eloquence? We shall be fortunate if, treading an adjacent path, we come to its meaning even by a circuitous route.

§ 347. "You recollect,"³ said he, "my dearest brethren, many things which have been decreed for you at this time; how some matters have in our council been commanded, others inhibited. A rude and confused chaos of crimes required the deliberation of many days; an inveterate malady demanded a sharp remedy; for while we give unbounded scope to our clemency, our papal office finds numberless matters to proscribe, none to spare. But it has hitherto arisen from human frailty that you have erred, and that, deceived by the speciousness of vice, you have exasperated the long-suffering of God by too lightly regarding his forbearance. It has arisen too from human wantonness, that disregarding lawful wedlock, you have not duly considered the heinousness of adultery. From too great covetousness, also, it has arisen that, as opportunity offered, making captive your brethren, bought by the same great price, you have outrageously extorted from them their wealth. To you, however, now suffering this perilous shipwreck of sin, a secure haven of rest is offered, unless you neglect it. A station of perpetual safety will be awarded you, for the exertion of a trifling labour against the Turks. Compare now the labours which you underwent in the practice of wickedness, and those which you will encounter in the undertaking I advise. The intention of committing adultery or murder begets many fears (for, as Solomon says, 'There is nothing more timid than guilt') and many labours; for what is more toilsome than wickedness? But, 'He who walks uprightly walks securely.' Of these labours, of these fears, the end was sin; the wages of sin is death; the death of sinners is most dreadful. Now the same labours and apprehensions are required from you for a better consideration. The cause of these labours will be charity; if thus warned by the command of God, you lay down your lives for the brethren; the wages of charity will be the grace of God; the grace of God is followed by eternal life. Go then prosperously; go then with confidence to attack the enemies of God; for they long since (O sad reproach to Christians!) have seized on Syria, Armenia, and lastly all Asia Minor, the provinces of which are Bithynia, Phrygia, Galatia, Lydia, Caria, Pamphylia, Isauria, Licia, Cilicia, and now they insolently domineer over Illyricum, and all the hither countries, even to the sea, which is called the straits of St. George. Nay, they usurp even the sepulchre of our Lord, that singular assurance of faith, and sell to our pilgrims admissions to that city which ought, had they a trace of their ancient courage left, to be open to Christians only. This alone might be enough to cloud our brows; but now, who except the most abandoned or the most envious of Christian reputation can endure that we do not divide the world equally with them? They inhabit Asia, the third portion of the world, as their native soil, which was not improperly esteemed by our ancestors equal, by the extent of its tracts and greatness of its provinces, to the two remaining parts. There formerly sprung up the branches of our religion; there all the apostles, except two, consecrated their deaths; there, at the present day, the Christians, if any survive, sustaining life by a wretched kind of agriculture, pay these miscreants tribute, and even with stifled sighs long for the participation of your liberty since they have lost their own. They hold Africa also, another quarter of the world, already possessed by their arms for more than two hundred years; which, on this account, I pronounce derogatory to Christian honour, because that country was anciently the nurse of celebrated geniuses, who, by their divine writings, will mock the rust of antiquity as long as there shall be a person who can relish Roman literature ;¹ the learned know the truth of what I say. Europe, the third portion of the world, remains ; of which how small a part do we Christians inhabit, for who can call all those barbarians who dwell in remote islands of the Frozen Ocean, Christians, since they live after a savage manner ? Even this small portion of the world, belonging to us, the Turks and Saracens oppress. Thus for three hundred years Spain and the Balearic isles being subjugated to them, the possession of the remainder is eagerly anticipated by feeble men, who, not having courage to engage in close encounter, love a flying mode of warfare ; for the Turk never ventures upon close fight, but when driven from his station, bends his bow at a distance, and trusts the winds with his meditated wound ; and as he uses poisoned arrows, venom, and not valour, inflicts death on the man he strikes. Whatever he effects, then, I attribute to fortune, not to courage, because he wars by flight and by poison. It is apparent, too, that every race born in that region, being scorched with the intense heat of the sun, abounds more in reflection than in blood ; and, therefore, they avoid coming to close quarters, because they are aware how little blood they possess. Whereas the people who are born amid the polar frosts and distant from the sun's heat are less cautious indeed ; but, elate from their copious and luxuriant flow of blood, they fight with the greatest alacrity. You are a nation born in the more temperate regions of the world, who may be both prodigal of blood in defiance of death and wounds, and are not deficient in prudence. For you are equally obedient in camp, and prudent in battle. Thus endued with skill and with valour, you undertake a memorable expedition. You will be extolled throughout all ages if you rescue your brethren from danger. To those present, in God's name, I command this ; to the absent I enjoin it. Let such as are going to fight for Christianity put the form of the cross upon their garments, that they may outwardly demonstrate their devotion to their inward faith ; enjoying by the gift of God and the privilege of St. Peter, absolution from all their crimes ; and, in the mean time, let this joyful consideration soothe the labour of their journey, that they shall obtain after death the advantages of a blessed martyrdom. Putting an end to your crimes then, that Christians may at least live peaceably in these countries, go, and employ in a more righteous war that valour and that sagacity which you used to waste in civil broils : go, soldiers everywhere renowned in fame, go, and subdue these dastardly nations. Let the noted valour of the French advance, which, accompanied by its adjoining nations, shall affright the whole world by the single terror of its name. But why do I delay you longer by detracting from the courage of the Gentiles ? Rather bring to your recollection the saying of God, ' Narrow is the way which leadeth to life.' Be it then that the track to be followed is narrow, replete with death, and terrible with dangers ; still this path will lead to your lost country ; for ' by much tribulation you must enter into the kingdom of God.' Expect, then, if you shall be made captive, torments and chains; nay, every possible suffering that can be inflicted: undergo, for the firmness of your faith, even horrible punishments; that so, if it be necessary, you may redeem your souls at the expense of your bodies. Do you fear death, you men of exemplary courage and intrepidity? Surely human wickedness can devise nothing against you worthy to be put in competition with heavenly glory; 'for the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory which shall be revealed to us hereafter.' Know you not, 'that for men to live is wretchedness, but to die is gain?' This doctrine, if you remember, you imbibed with your mother's milk, through the preaching of the clergy: and this doctrine your ancestors, the martyrs, held out by their example. Death sets free from its filthy prison the human soul, which then takes flight for the mansions fitted to its virtues. Death accelerates their country to the good; death cuts short the wickedness of the ungodly. By means of death, then, the soul made free is either soothed with joyful hope, or is punished without farther apprehension of worse. So long as it is fettered to the body, it derives from it earthly contagion; and to speak more truly, is dead. For, earthly with heavenly, and divine with mortal, ill agree. The soul, indeed, even now in its state of union with the body, is capable of great efforts; it gives life to its instrument, secretly moving and animating it to exertions almost beyond mortal nature: but when freed from the clog which drags it to the earth, it regains its proper station, it partakes of a blessed and perfect energy, communicating in some measure with the invisibility of the divine nature. Discharging a double office, therefore, it ministers life to the body when it is present, and the cause of its change when it departs. You must observe how pleasantly the soul wakes in the sleeping body, and, apart from the senses, sees many future events by reason of its relationship to the Deity. Why then do ye fear death who love the repose of sleep, which resembles death? Surely it must be madness, through lust of a transitory life, to deny yourselves that which is eternal. Rather, my dearest brethren, should it so happen, lay down your lives for the brotherhood: rid God's sanctuary of the wicked: expel the robbers: bring in the pious. Let no love of relations detain you, for man's chiefest love ought to be towards God. Let no attachment to your native soil be an impediment, because in different points of view all the world is exile to the Christian, and all the world his country: thus exile is his country, and his country exile. Let none be restrained from going by the largeness of his patrimony, for a still larger is promised him, not of such things as soothe the miserable with vain expectation, or flatter the indolent disposition with the mean advantages of wealth, but of such as are shown by perpetual example and approved by daily experience. Yet these, too, are pleasant but vain, and which to such as despise them produce reward an hundred-fold. These things I publish, these I command; and for their execution I fix the end of the ensuing spring. God will be gracious to those who undertake this expedition, that they may have a favourable year, both in abundance of produce and in serenity of season. Those who may die will enter the mansions of heaven, while the living shall behold the sepulchre of the Lord. And what can be greater happiness than for a man, in his life-time, to see those places which the Lord of heaven visited in his human nature? Blessed are they, who, called to these occupations, shall inherit such a recompense; fortunate are those who are led to such a conflict, that they may partake of such rewards."

² "It is beyond doubt that king Philip and his concubine Bertrade were anathematized by Urban in the council of Clermont; but we are not acquainted with any writer prior to Alberic, monk of Trefontaines, and a writer of the 13th century, who asserts that it was forbidden to any one to obey him or call him lord or king; and history refutes the assertion, for we do not read that any of the French, who considered Philip as lawfully divorced from his consort, withdrew their allegiance from him on that account."—Note in Bouquet, xiii. 6.

³ There are other orations, said to have been delivered by Urban in this council, remaining; and Labb. (Concil. x. 511, 514) has printed two from a Vatican MS.: but they are both very inferior to the narrative of Malmesbury.

§ 348. I have adhered to the tenour of this address, retaining some few things unaltered, on account of the truth of the remarks, but omitting many. The bulk of the auditors, being extremely excited, attested their sentiments by a shout; pleased with the speech, and inclined to the pilgrimage: and immediately, in presence of the council, some of the nobility, falling down at the knees of the pope, consecrated themselves and their property to the service of God. Among these was Aimar, the very powerful bishop of Puy, who afterwards ruled the army by his prudence, and augmented it through his eloquence. In the month of November, then, in which this council was held, each departed to his home. The good news soon becoming generally reported, refreshed as with a gentle breeze the minds of the Christians: and being universally diffused, there was no nation so remote or secluded, as not to contribute its portion: for this ardent devotion not only inspired the continental provinces, but even all who had heard the name of Christ, whether in the most distant islands, or savage countries. The Welshman left his hunting; the Scot his fellowship with vermin; the Dane his drinking party; the Norwegian his raw fish. Lands were deserted of their husbandmen; houses of their inhabitants; even whole cities migrated. There was no regard to relationship; affection to their country was held in little esteem; God alone was placed before their eyes. Whatever was stored in granaries, or hoarded in chambers, to answer the hopes of the avaricious husbandman, or the covetousness of the miser, all was deserted; they hungered and thirsted after Jerusalem alone. Joy attended such as went; while grief oppressed those who remained. But why do I say remained? You might see the husband departing with his wife, indeed, with all his family; you would smile to see the whole household laden on a carriage, about to proceed on their journey.¹ The road was too narrow for the passengers, the path too confined for the travellers; so thickly were they thronged with endless multitudes. The number surpassed all human imagination, though the itinerants were estimated at six millions.² Doubtless, never did so many nations unite in one opinion; never did so immense a population subject their unruly passions to one, and almost to no, direction. For the strangest wonder to behold was, that such a countless multitude marched gradually through various Christian countries without plundering, though there was none to restrain them. Mutual regard blazed forth in all; so that, if any one found in his possession what he knew did not belong to him, he exposed it everywhere for several days, to be owned; and the desire of the finder was suspended, till perchance the wants of the loser might be repaired.¹

§ 349. The long looked-for month of March was now at hand, when, the hoary garb of winter being laid aside, the world, clad in vernal bloom, invited the pilgrims to the confines of the East; nor, such was the ardour of their minds, did they seek delay. Godfrey duke of Lorrain proceeded by way of Hungary: second to none in military virtue, and, descended from the ancient lineage of Charles the Great, he inherited much of Charles, both in blood and in mind: he was followed by the Frisians, Lorrainers, Saxons, and all the people who dwell between the Rhine and the Garonne.² Raimund³ earl of St. Giles, and Aimar bishop of Puy, nobly matched in valour, and alike noted for valour and piety, took the route of Dalmatia: under their standard marched the Goths and Gascons, and all the people scattered throughout the Pyrenees and the Alps. Before them, by a shorter route, went Boamund, an Apulian by residence, but a Norman by descent: for embarking at Brindisi, and landing at Durazzo, he marched to Constantinople by roads with which he was well acquainted: under his command Italy, and the whole adjacent province, from the Tuscan sea to the Adriatic, joined in the war. All these assembling, at the same time, at Constantinople, partook somewhat of mutual joy. Here, too, they found Hugh the Great, brother of Philip king of France: for having inconsiderately, and with a few soldiers, entered the territories of the emperor, he was taken by his troops, and detained in free custody. But Alexis, emperor of Constantinople, alarmed at the arrival of these chiefs, willingly, but, as it were, induced by their entreaties, released him. Alexis was a man famed for his duplicity, and never attempted anything of importance unless by stratagem. He had taken off Guiscard, as I before related,⁴ by poison, and had corrupted his wife by gold; falsely promising by his emissaries to marry her. Again, too, he allowed William earl of Poictou to be led into an ambush of the Turks, and, after losing sixty thousand⁵ soldiers, to escape almost unattended; being incensed at his reply, when he refused homage to the Greek. In after time, he laid repeated snares for Boamund, who was marching against him to avenge the injuries of the crusaders; and when these failed he bereaved him of his brother Guido, and of almost all his army; making use of his usual arts, either in poisoning the rivers or their garments : but of this hereafter. Now, however, removing the army from the city, and mildly addressing the chiefs, his Grecian eloquence proved so powerful, that he obtained from them all, homage, and an oath that they would form no plot against him ; and that, if they could subdue the cities pertaining to his empire, they would restore them to him : thus purchasing another's advantage at the expense of their own blood. The credit of maintaining his liberty, appeared more estimable to Raimund alone : so that he neither did homage to him, nor took the oath. Collecting, then, all their forces, they made an attack on Nicea, a city of Bithinia : for they chose to assault this first, both as it was an obstacle to the crusaders, and as they were eager to revenge the death of those pilgrims who had recently been slain there. For, one Walter, a distinguished soldier, but precipitate, (for you will scarcely see prudence and valour united in the same person, as one retards what the other advances,) incautiously roaming around the walls, had perished with a numerous party, which Peter the Hermit had allured from their country by his preaching.

§ 350. Now, too, in the month of September, Robert earl of Normandy, brother of king William whose name is prefixed to this book, earnestly desiring to enter on the expedition, was accompanied by Robert of Flanders, and Stephen of Blois, who had married his sister. They were three earls all of noble lineage, and corresponding valour. Under their command were the English and Normans, the Western Franks, and people of Flanders, and all the tribes lying between the British Ocean and the Alps. Proceeding on their journey, at Lucca they found pope Urban, who, being enraged at Guibert, as I have said, was, by the assistance of Matilda, carrying war into Italy, and around the city of Rome. He had now so far succeeded, that the Roman people, inclining to his party, were harassing that of Guibert, both by words and blows ; nor did the one faction spare the other, either in the churches or in the streets, until Guibert, being the weaker, left the see vacant for Urban, and fled to Germany

§ 351. Of Rome, formerly the mistress of the globe, but which now, in comparison with its ancient state, appears a small town ; and of the Romans, once "sovereigns over all, and the toga-clad nation,"¹ but now the most slothful of men, bartering justice for gold, and dispensing with the canons for money ; of this city and its inhabitants, I say, whatever I might attempt to write has been anticipated by the verses of Hildebert, first, bishop of Mans, and afterwards archbishop of Tours :² which verses I insert, not to assume the honour acquired by another man's labour, but rather as a proof of a liberal mind, inasmuch as, not envying his fame, I give testimony to his graceful eloquence :—

Rome, thy grand ruins, still beyond compare,

² Hildebert was translated to Tours A. D. 1125, upon the death of Gislebert, who died at Rome about the middle of Dec. 1124, in the same week with Pope Calixtus. Orderic. Vital. p. 832. This poem is printed in his works, col. 1334.

Though time thy stately palaces around
 Hath strew'd, and cast thy temples to the ground.
 Fall'n is the pow'r, the pow'r Araxes dire Regrets now gone, and dreaded when entire ;
 Which arms and laws, and e'en the gods on high
 Bade o'er the world assume the mastery ;
 Which guilty Cæsar rather had enjoy'd
 Alone, than e'er a fostering hand employ'd.
 Which gave to foes, to vice, to friends its care,
 Subdued, restrain'd, or bade its kindness share.
 This growing pow'r, the holy fathers rear'd,
 Where near the stream the fav'ring spot appear'd.
 From either pole, materials, artists meet,
 And rising walls their proper station greet ;
 Kings gave their treasures, fav'ring too was fate,
 And arts and riches on the structure wait.
 Fall'n is that city, whose proud fame to reach,
 I merely say, "Rome was," there fails my speech.
 Still neither time's decay, nor sword, nor fire,
 Shall cause its beauty wholly to expire.
 Human exertions raised that splendid Rome,
 Which gods in vain shall strive to overcome.
 Bid wealth, bid marble, and bid fate attend,
 And watchful artists o'er the labour bend,
 Still shall the matchless ruin art defy
 The old to rival, or its loss supply.
 Here gods themselves their sculptured forms admire,
 And only to reflect those forms aspire ;
 Nature unable such like gods to form,
 Left them to man's creative genius warm ;
 Life breathes within them, and the suppliant falls,
 Not to the god, but statues in the walls.
 City thrice bless'd ! were tyrants but away,
 Or shame compell'd them justice to obey.

§ 352. Are not these sufficient to point out in such a city, both the dignity of its former advantages and the majesty of its present ruin ? But that nothing may be wanting to its honour, I will add the number of its gates and the multitude of its sacred relics ; and, that no person may complain of his being deprived of any knowledge by the obscurity of the narrative, the description shall run in an easy and familiar style.¹

The first is the Cornelian gate, which is now called the gate of St. Peter and the Cornelian way. Near it is situated the church of St. Peter, in which his body lies, decked with gold and precious stones ; and no one knows the number of the holy martyrs who rest in that church. On the same way is another church, in which lie the holy virgins Rufina and Secunda. In a third church are Marius and Martha, and Audifax and Abacuc, their sons.

The second is the Flaminian gate, which is now called the gate of St. Valentine² and the Flaminian way, and when it arrives at the Milvian bridge it takes the name of the Ravennanian way, because it leads to Ravenna ; and there, at the first stone without the gate, St. Valentine rests in his church.

The third is called the Porcinian³ gate, and the way, the same ; but where it joins to the Salarian it loses its name, and there, nearly in the spot which is called Cucumeris, lie the martyrs, Festus, Johannes, Liberalis, Diogenes, Blastus, Lucina, and, in one sepulchre, the two hundred and sixty,¹ in another the thirty.

The fourth is the Salarian² gate and way, now called St. Silvester's. Here, near the road, lie St. Hermes and St. Vasella, and Protus and Jacinctus, Maxilian, Herculano, Crispus; and in another place, hard by, rest the holy martyrs Pamphilus and Quirinus, seventy steps beneath the surface. Next is the church of St. Felicitas, where she rests, and Silanus her son; and not far distant, Boniface the martyr. In another church there are Crisantus, and Daria, and Saturninus, and Maurus, and Jason, and their mother Hilaria, and others innumerable. And in another church are St. Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis, sons of St. Felicitas, and seven holy virgins, Saturnina, Hilarina, Duranda, Rogantina, Serotina, Paulina, and Donata. Next comes the church of St. Silvester, where he lies under a marble tomb; and the martyrs, Celestinus, Philip- pus, and Fœlix; and there too, the three hundred and sixty-five martyrs rest in one sepulchre; and near them lie Paulus and Cres- centianus, Prisca, and Semetrius, Praxedis, Potentiana.

The fifth is called the Numentan³ gate. There lies St. Nico- mede, priest and martyr; the way too is called by the same name. Near the road are the church and body of St. Agnes; in another church, St. Emerentiana and the martyrs Alexander, Felix, and Papias; at the seventh mile-stone, on this road, rests the holy pope Alexander, with Eventius and Theodolus.

The sixth is the Tiburtine⁴ gate and way, which is now called St. Lawrence's; near this way lies St. Lawrence in his church, and Abundius the martyr; and near this, in another church, rest these martyrs, Ciriaca, Romanus, Justinus, and Crescentianus; and not far from hence is the church of St. Hippolitus, where he himself rests, and his family, eighteen in number; there too repose St. Tri- fena, the wife of Decius, and his daughter Cirilla, and her nurse Concordia. And in another part of this way, is the church of Agapitus the martyr.

The seventh is called, at present, the Greater gate,⁵ formerly the Siracusan, and the way the Lavicanian, which leads to St. Helena. Near this are buried Peter, Marcellinus, Tyburtius, Geminus, Gor- gonius, and the forty soldiers,⁶ and others without number, and a little farther the Four Coronati.⁷

The eighth is the gate of St. John,⁸ which by the ancients was called Assenarica. The ninth gate is called Metrosa;⁹ and in front of both these runs the Latin way. The tenth is called the Latin gate,¹⁰ and way. Near this, in one church, lie the martyrs, Gordianus and Epimachus, Sulpicius, Valerianus, Quintus, Quartus, Sophia and Triphenus. Near this, too, in another spot, Tertullinus; and not far distant, the church of St. Eugenia, in which she lies, and her mother Claudia, and pope Stephen, with nineteen of his clergy, and Nemesius the deacon.

The eleventh is called the Appian gate¹ and way. There lie St. Sebastian, and Quirinus, and formerly the bodies of the apostles rested there. A little nearer Rome, are the martyrs Januarius, Urbanus, Xenon, Quintinus, Agapitus, and Felicissimus; and in another church, Tyburtius, Valerianus, and Maximus. Not far distant is the church of the martyr Cecilia; and there are buried Stephanus, Sixtus, Zepherinus, Eusebius, Melchiades, Marcellus, Eutichianus, Dionysius, Anteros, Pontianus, pope Lucius, Optacius, Julianus, Colocerus, Parthenius, Tarsicius, and Policamus, martyrs; there too are the church and body of St. Cornelius; and in another church St. Sotheris; and not far off rest the martyrs, Hyppolitus, Adrian, Eusebius, Maria, Martha, Paulina, Valeria, and Marcellus, and, near, pope Marcus in his church. Between the Appian and Ostiensian way is the Ardeano way, where are Marcus and Marcellianus. And there lies pope Damasus in his church; and near him St. Petronilla, and Nereus, and Anchilleus, and many more.

The twelfth gate and way was called the Ostian, but, at present, St. Paul's,² because he lies near it in his church. There too is the martyr Timotheus; and near, in the church of St. Tecla, are the martyrs Felix, Audactus, and Nemesius. At the Three Fountains³ is the head of the martyr St. Anastasius.

The thirteenth is called the Portuan⁴ gate and way, near which in a church are the martyrs, Felix, Alexander, Abdon, and Senes, Symeon, Anastasius, Polion, Vincentius, Milex, Candida, and Innocentia.

The fourteenth is the Aurelian⁵ gate and way, which now is called the gate of St. Pancras, because he lies near it in his church, and the other martyrs, Paulinus, Arthemius, and St. Sapientia, with her three daughters, Faith, Hope, and Charity. In another church are Processus and Martinianus; and, in a third, two Felixes; in a fourth St. Calixtus and Calepodius; in a fifth St. Basilides. At the twelfth mile-stone within the city, on Mount Celius, are the martyrs Johannes and Paulus, in their house, which was made a church after their martyrdom; and Crispin and Crispinianus, and St. Benedicta. On the same mount is the church of St. Stephen, the first martyr; and there are buried the martyrs Primus and Felicianus; on Mount Aventine St. Boniface, and on Mount Nola St. Tatiana rests.

saders arrived, were disturbing everything with wild ambition, and, when unable to satisfy their lust of money, pouring out the blood of their fellow-citizens over the bodies of the very saints. The earls, confiding them in Urban's benediction, having passed through Tuscany and Campania, came by Apulia to Calabria, and would have embarked immediately had not the seamen, on being consulted, forbade them, on account of the violence of the south winds. In consequence, the earls of Normandy and Blois passed the winter there, sojourning each among their friends as convenient. The earl of Flanders, alone, ventured to sea, experiencing a prosperous issue to a rash attempt; wherefore part of this assembled multitude returned home through want, and part of them died from the unwholesomeness of the climate. The earls who remained however, when at the beginning of the spring they saw the sea sufficiently calm for the expedition, set sail, and, by Christ's assistance, landed safely at two ports. Thence, through Thessaly, the metropolis of which is Thessalonica and Thracia, they came to Constantinople. Many of the lower order perished on the march through disease and want; many lost their lives at the Devil's-ford, as it is called from its rapidity; and more indeed would have perished had not the advanced cavalry been stationed in the river to break the violence of the current, by which means the lives of some were saved, and the rest passed over on horseback. The whole multitude then, to solace themselves for their past labours, indulged in rest for fifteen days, pitching their camp in the suburbs of the city; of which, as the opportunity has presented itself, I shall briefly speak.

§ 354. Constantinople was first called Bizantium; which name is still preserved by the imperial money called Bezants. St. Aldhelm, in his book on Virginity,¹ relates that it changed its appellation by divine suggestion; his words are as follow. As Constantine was sleeping in this city, he imagined that there stood before him an old woman, whose forehead was furrowed with age; but that presently, clad in an imperial robe, she became transformed into a beautiful girl, and so fascinated his eyes, by the elegance of her youthful charms, that he could not refrain from kissing her; that Helena, his mother, being present, then said, "She shall be yours for ever; nor shall she die till the end of time." When he awoke, the emperor obtained from heaven, by fasting and almsgiving, an explanation of the dream. For behold, within eight days, being cast again into a deep sleep, he thought he saw pope Silvester, who died some little time before, regarding his convert² with complacency, and saying, "You have acted with your customary prudence, in waiting for a solution from God of that enigma which was beyond the comprehension of man. The old woman you saw is this city, worn down by age, whose time-struck walls, menacing approaching ruin, require a restorer. But you, renewing its walls and its affluence, shall signalize it also with your name, and here shall the imperial progeny reign for ever. You shall not, however, lay the foundations at your own pleasure; but mounting the horse on which, when in the noviciate of your faith, you rode round the churches of the apostles at Rome, you shall give him the rein, and liberty to go whither he please; you shall have, too, in your hand, your royal spear, whose point shall describe the circuit of the wall on the ground. You will regard, therefore, the track of the spear as the direction in which you are to lay the foundations of the wall."

§ 355. The emperor eagerly obeyed the vision, and built a city equal to Rome; alleging that the emperor ought not to reign in Rome, where the martyred apostles, from the time of Christ, held dominion. He built in it two churches, one of which was dedicated to Peace, the other to the Apostles; bringing thither many bodies of saints, who might conciliate the assistance of God against the incursions of its enemies. He placed in the circus, for the admiration and ornament of the city, the statues of triumphal heroes, brought from Rome, and the images of heathen deities to excite the contempt of the beholders, and the tripods from Delphi. They relate that it was highly gratifying to the emperor to receive a mandate from heaven,¹ to found a city in that place, where the fruitfulness of the soil, and the temperature of the atmosphere, conduced to the health of its inhabitants; for as he was born in Britain,² he could not endure the burning heat of the sun. Thracia is a province of Europe, as the poets observe, extremely cool, "From Hebrus' ice and the Bistonian North," and near to fruitful Moesia, where, as Virgil remarks,³ "With wonder Gargara the harvest sees." But Constantinople, washed by the sea, obtains the mingled temperature both of Europe and of Asia, because the Asiatic east wind coming only from a short distance, tempers the severity of the northern blast. The city is surrounded by a vast extent of walls, yet the influx of strangers is so great, as to make it crowded. In consequence, they form a mole in the sea, by throwing in masses of rock and loads of sand; and the space obtained by this new device, straightens the ancient waters. The sea looks wonderingly at fields unknown before, amid its glassy waves, and surrounds and supplies its city with all the conveniences of the earth. The town is encompassed on every side, except the north, by the ocean, and is full of angles in the circuit of its walls, where it corresponds with the windings of the sea, which walls contain a space of twenty miles in circumference. The Danube, which is likewise called the Ister, flows in hidden channels underground into the city; and on certain days being let out by the removal of a plug, it carries off the filth of the streets into the sea.¹ All vied with the emperor in noble zeal to give splendour to this city, each thinking he was bound to advance the work in hand, one contributing holy relics, another money; Constantine all things.

§ 356. After Constantine the Great, the following emperors reigned here. Constantine his son; Julian the apostate; Jovinian, Valens, Theodosius the elder; Archadius, Theodosius the younger; Marcianus, Leo the First; Leo the Younger; Zeno, Anastasius, Justin the Elder; Justinian (who, famed for his learning and his wars, built a church in Constantinople to the Divine Wisdom, that is, to the Lord Jesus Christ, and called it Hagia Sophia, a structure, as they report, surpassing every other edifice in the world, and where ocular inspection proves it superior to its most pompous descriptions;) Justin the Younger; Tiberius, Mauricius, the first Greek; Focas, Heraclius, Constantine, the son of Heraclius; Heracleonas, and Constans (this last coming to Rome and purloining all the remains of ancient decoration, stripped the churches even of their brazen tiles, anxiously wishing to gain renown at Constantinople, even from such spoils as these; his covetousness, however, turned out unfortunately for himself, for being shortly after killed at Syracuse, he left all these honourable spoils to be conveyed to Alexandria by the Saracens;) Constantine, Justinian, Leontius, Tiberius, another Justinian, Philippicus, Anastasius, Theodosius, Leo the Third; all these² reigned both at Constantinople and at Rome; the following in Constantinople only: Constantine, Leo, Constantine, Nicephorus, Stauratius, Michael, Leo, Michael, Theophilus, Michael, Basilius, Leo, Alexander, Constantine, two of the name of Romanus, Nicephorus, Focas, John, Basil, and Constantine, Romanus, Michael, Michael, Constantine, Theodora the empress, Michael, Sachius,³ Constantine, Romanus Diogenes, Nicephorus Butanius, and Michael,⁴ who, driven from the empire by Alexis, secretly fled to Guiscard in Apulia, and surrendering to him his power, imagined he had done something prejudicial to Alexis; hence Guiscard's ambition conceived greater designs; falsely persuading himself that he might acquire by industry what the other had lost by inactivity; how far he succeeded the preceding book hath explained. In the same city is the cross of our Saviour, brought by Helena from Jerusalem. There, too, rest the apostles, Andrew, James the brother of our Lord; Matthias; the prophets Elizeus, Daniel, Samuel, and many others; Luke the evangelist; martyrs innumerable; the confessors Johannes Chrysostom, Basil, Gregorius Nazianzen, and Spiridion; the virgins Agatha and Lucia, and lastly all the saints whose bodies the emperors were able to transport thither out of every country.

§ 357. The earls, then, of Normandy and Blois did homage to the Greek; for the earl of Flanders had already passed on, disdainingly to perform this ceremony from the recollection that he was freely born and educated. The others giving and receiving promises of fidelity, proceeded in the first week of June to Nicea, which the rest had already besieged from the middle of May. Uniting, therefore, their forces, much carnage ensued on either side, since every kind of weapon could easily be hurled by the townsmen on those who were beneath them, and the arm even of the weakest had effect on persons crowded together. Moreover the Turks dragged up with iron hooks numberless dead bodies of our people, to mangle them in mockery, or to strip them of their raiment. The Franks were grieved at this; nor did they cease venting their rage by slaughter till the Turks, wearied by extremity of suffering, on the day of the summer solstice surrendered themselves to the emperor by means of secret messengers. He, accustomed to consult only his own advantage, gave orders to the Franks to depart; choosing rather that the city should be reserved for the undisguised disloyalty of the Turks than the distrusted power of the Franks. He ordered, however, silver and gold to be distributed to the chiefs, and copper coin to those of inferior rank, lest they should complain of being unrewarded. Thus the Turks, who passing the Euphrates had now for the space of fifty years been possessed of Bithynia, which is that part of Asia Minor which is called Romania, betook themselves to flight to the eastward. Nevertheless, when the siege was ended, they attempted, at the instigation of Soliman,¹ who had been sovereign of all Romania, to harass the army on its advance. This man collecting, as is computed, three hundred and sixty thousand archers, attacked our people, expecting anything rather than hostility, with such violence, that, overwhelmed and terrified by the iron shower of arrows, they immediately fled. At that time, by chance, duke Godfrey and Hugh the Great, and Raimund had taken another route, that they might plunder the enemies' country to a wider extent, and obtain forage with more facility. But the Norman, sensible of his extreme danger, by means of expeditious messengers on a safe track, acquainted Godfrey and the rest of the approach of the Turks. They, without a moment's delay, turned against the enemy, and delivered their associates from danger: for these were now indiscriminately slaughtered in their tents, unprepared for resistance, and filling the air with prayers and lamentations. Nor did the enemy take any particular aim, but trusting his arrows to the wind, he never, from the thickness of the ranks, drew his bow vain. What alone retarded destruction was, that the attack took place near a thicket of canes, which prevented the Turkish cavalry from acting freely. At length, however, perceiving the advanced guard of the approaching chiefs, the Christians left the thicket, and shouting the military watch-word, "It is the will of God,"¹ they attack the scattered ranks of the enemy, making a signal to their companions at the same time to assail them in the rear. Thus the Turks, pressed on either side, forthwith fled, shrieking with a dreadful cry, and raising a yell which reached the clouds: nor had they recourse to their customary practice of a flying battle, but throwing down their bows they manifested, by a flight of three successive days, something greater than mere human apprehension. But there was no one capable of following them, for our horses, scarce able to support life on the barren turf, were unequal to a vigorous pursuit; showing immediately their want of strength by their panting sides. Asia was formerly, it is true, a land most fruitful in corn; but, both in ancient and in recent times it had been so plundered by the savage Turks, that it could scarcely suffice for the maintenance of a small army, much less of a multitude so vast as to threaten the devouring of whole harvests and drinking of rivers dry. For when they departed from Nicea they were still estimated at seven hundred thousand; of the remainder, part had been wasted by the sword, part by sickness, and still more had deserted to their homes.

§ 358. Thence, then, they arrived at Heraclea by the route of Antioch and Iconium, cities of Pisidia. Here they beheld in the sky a portent fashioned like a flaming sword, the point of which extended towards the East. All the period from the kalends of July [July 1], when they left Nicea, till the nones of October [Oct. 7,] had elapsed when they arrived at Antioch in Syria. The situation of this city I should describe, had not my wish in this respect been anticipated by the eloquence of Ambrosius in Hegesippus;² and were I not also fearful that I might be blamed for the perpetual digressions of my narrative. Still, however, I will relate so much as the labour I have undertaken seems to require.

§ 359. The city of Antioch, which was named after his father, Antiochus, by Seleucus king of Asia, is surrounded with a vast wall, which even contains a mountain within it. Next to Rome, and Constantinople, and Alexandria, it obtains precedence over the cities of the world. It is secure by its walls, difficult of access from its hilly situation; and if ever taken, it must be more by stratagem than force. The nearest river to it, which I learn is now called Fernus though originally Orontes, falls into the sea twelve miles from the city; its tide, impetuous and growing colder from its rapidity, ministering to the health of the inhabitants by its effect on the atmosphere. Capable, too, of receiving supplies by shipping for the service of its citizens, it can at all times mock the efforts of its besiegers. Here the venerable title of Christian was first conceived; ¹ hence, first St. Paul, the spring and spur of this religion, went forth to preach; here the first bishopric was filled by St. Peter, in honour to whom the church there founded remained uninjured through the whole domination of the Turks: and another dedicated to St. Mary equally struck the spectators with its beauty, exciting wonder that they should reverence the church of Him whose faith they persecuted.

§ 360. This city, then, the Franks invested from October till June,² pitching their tents around the walls after they had passed the river. Foreseeing, however, the difficulty of taking it, and judging it expedient to provide against the cowardice of certain of their party, the chiefs, in common, took an oath that they would not desist from the siege till the city should be taken by force, or by stratagem. And, that they might more easily complete their design, they built many fortresses on this side the river, in which soldiers were placed to keep guard. Aoxianus, too, the governor of the city, observing that the Franks acted neither jestingly nor coldly, but set heartily to besiege it, sent his son Sansadol to the sultan,³ the emperor, to make known the boldness of the Franks and to implore assistance. The Persian sultan, a title equivalent to Augustus among the Romans, is commander of all the Saracens, and of the whole East. I imagine this empire has continued so long, and still increases, because the people, as I have related, are unwarlike, and being deficient in active blood, know not how to cast off slavery when once admitted; not being aware, as Lucan says,⁴ that

“Arms were bestow'd that men should not be slaves.”

But the Western nations, bold and fierce, disdain long-continued subjugation to any people whatever, often delivering themselves from servitude, and imposing it on others. Moreover the Roman empire first declined to the Franks, and after to the Germans; the Eastern continues ever with the Persians.

§ 361. Sansadol, therefore, being despatched to the chief of this empire, hastened his course with youthful ardour; and his father in the meantime was by no means wanting to the duties of a commander in the protection of the city. The valour of the besieged was not content merely to defend their own party, but voluntarily harassed ours, frequently and suddenly attacking them when foraging, or marketing; for, making a bridge of the vessels which they found there, they had established a mart beyond the river. Through Christ's assistance, therefore, becoming resolute, they seized their arms, and boldly repelled their enemies, so that they never suffered them to reap the honour of the day. To revenge this disgrace, the Turks wreaked their indignation on the Syrian and Armenian inhabitants of the city, throwing, by means of their balistæ¹ and petraries, the heads of those whom they had slain, into the camp of the Franks, that by such means they might wound their feelings.

§ 362. And now, everything which could be procured for food being destroyed around the city, a sudden famine, which usually makes even fortresses give way, began to oppress the army; so much so, that the harvest not having yet attained to maturity, some persons seized the pods of beans before they were ripe, as the greatest delicacy; others fed on horse-flesh, or hides soaked in water; others passed parboiled thistles through their bleeding jaws into their stomachs. Others sold mice, or such like dainties, to those who required them; content to suffer hunger themselves so that they could procure money. Some, too, there were who even stuffed carcase into carcase, feeding on human flesh; but at a distance and on the mountains, lest others should be offended at the smell of their cookery. Many wandered through unknown paths, in expectation of meeting with sustenance, and were killed by robbers acquainted with the passes. But not long after, the city was surrendered.

§ 363. For Boamund, a man of superior talents, had, by dint of very great promises made by his emissaries, induced a Turkish chief who had the custody of the principal tower, on the side where his station lay, to deliver it up to him.² And he, too, to palliate the infamy of his treachery by a competent excuse, gave his son as an hostage to Boamund; professing that he did so by the express command of Christ, which had been communicated to him in a dream. Boamund, therefore, advanced his troops to the tower, having first craftily obtained from the chiefs the perpetual government of the city, in case he could carry it. Thus the Franks, on a stormy night, scaled the walls by rope ladders, and displaying on the top of the tower the crimson standard of Boamund, repeated with joyful accents the Christian watch-word, "It is the will of God! It is the will of God!" The Turks awaking, and weary from want of rest, took to flight through narrow passages; and our party, following with drawn swords, made dreadful slaughter of the enemy. In this flight fell Aoxianus, governor of the city, being beheaded by a Syrian peasant: his head, when brought to the Franks, excited both their laughter and their joy.

§ 364. Not long rejoicing in this complete victory, they had, the next day, to lament being themselves besieged by the Turks from without. For the forces which had been solicited by Sansadol, were now arrived under the command of Corbaguath, an Eastern nobleman, who had obtained from the emperor of Persia three hundred thousand men,³ under twenty-seven commanders.

Sixty thousand of these ascended over the rocks to the citadel, by desire of the Turks, who still remained in possession of it. These woefully harassed the Christians by frequent sallies: nor was there any hope left, but from the assistance of God, since want was now added to the miseries of war; want, always the earliest attendant on great calamities. Wherefore, after a fast of three days, and earnest supplications, Peter the Hermit was sent ambassador to the Turks, who spake, with his usual eloquence,¹ to the following effect: That the Turks should now voluntarily evacuate the Christian territory, which they had formerly unjustly invaded; that it was but right, as the Christians did not attack Persia, that the Turks should not molest Asia; that they should therefore, either voluntarily return home, or expect an attack on the following morning; and suggested that each side should try its fortune, by two, or four, or eight champions, and not jeopardise the whole army.

§ 365. Corbaguath condescended not to honour the messenger even with a reply; but, playing at chess and gnashing his teeth, dismissed him as he came, merely observing, that the pride of the Franks was at an end. Hastily returning, Peter apprised the army of the insolence of the Turk. Each then animating the other, it was publicly ordered that every person should, that night, feed his horse as plentifully as possible, lest he should falter in the various evolutions of the following day. And now had the morning dawned, when, drawn up in bodies, they proceeded with hostile standard against the enemy. The first band was led by the two Roberts, earls of Normandy and Flanders, and Hugh the Great; the second by Godfrey; the third by the bishop of Puy; Boamund brought up the rear, as a support to the rest. Raimund continued in the city, to cover the retreat of our party, in case it should be necessary. The Turks, from a distance observing their movements, were at first dubious what they could mean. Afterwards, recognising the standard of the bishop, (for they were extremely afraid of him, as they said he was the pope of the Christians and the fomentor of the war,) and seeing our people advancing so courageously and quickly, they fled ere they were attacked. Our party, too, exhilarated with unexpected joy, slew the fugitives, as far as the strength of the infantry or exertion of the cavalry would permit. They imagined, moreover, that they saw the ancient martyrs, George and Demetrius, who had formerly been soldiers, and who had gained eternal life in reward for their death, come down from the mountains with upraised banners, hurling darts against the enemy, but assisting the Franks. Nor is it to be denied, that the martyrs did assist the Christians, as the angels formerly did the Maccabees,² fighting for the self-same cause. When the Franks returned for the purpose of plunder, they found in the Turkish camp sufficient to satisfy, or even totally to glut, the covetousness of the greediest army. This battle took place

An. Dom. 1098, on the fourth of the kalends of July [June 28]; for the city had been taken the day before the nones of July [July 6]. Soon after, on the kalends of the ensuing August [Aug. 1], the bishop of Puy, the leader of the Christians, and chief author of this laudable enterprise, died peacefully; and Hugh the Great, by permission of the chiefs, as it is said, returned to France, alleging as a reason a perpetual bowel complaint.

§ 366. But when, by a long repose of seven months at Antioch, they had obliterated the memory of their past labours, they began to think of proceeding on their route. And first of all Raimund, never idle, and whose pride it was ever to be first in the field; and next to him the two Roberts, and Godfrey, proceeded upon the march. Boamund alone for a time deferred his advance, lured by the prospect of a magnificent city, and the love of wealth. A plausible reason, however, lay concealed beneath his covetousness, when he alleged that Antioch ought not to be exposed to the Turks without a chief, as they would directly attack it. He therefore took up his residence in the city; and this harsh governor drove Raimund's followers, who occupied one of the streets, without the walls. The others, however, passing through Tripoli,¹ and Berytus, and Tyre, and Sidon, and Accaron, and Caiphas, and Cæsarea in Palestine, where they left the coast to the right hand, came to Ramula; being kindly received by some of the cities, and signaling their valour by the subjugation of others. For their design was to delay no longer, as it was now the month of April, and the produce of the earth had become fully ripe. Ramula is a very small city, without walls: and, if we credit report, the place of the martyrdom of St. George; whose church, originally founded there, the Turks had somewhat defaced: but at that time, through fear of the Franks, they had carried off their property and retreated to the mountains. The next morning at early dawn, Tancred the nephew of Boamund, a man of undaunted courage, and some others, taking arms, proceeded to Bethlehem, desirous of exploring the neighbourhood. The Syrians of the place, who came out to meet them, manifested their joy with weeping earnestness, through apprehension for their safety, on account of the smallness of their numbers; for few more than an hundred soldiers were of the party. But our people having devoutly prayed in the sacred edifice,² immediately stretch anxiously forward towards Jerusalem. The Turks, confident in their force, fiercely sallied out, and for some time skirmished with our troops, for the whole army had now come up; but they were soon repulsed by the exertions of the Franks, and sought security within their walls.

§ 367. The numbers who have already written on the subject, admonish me to say nothing of the situation and disposition of Jerusalem, nor is it necessary for my narrative to expatiate on such a field. Almost every person is acquainted with what Josephus, Eucherius, and Beda have said : for who is not aware that it was called Salem, from Melchisedek ; Jebus, from the Jebusites ; Jerusalem, from Solomon ? Who has not heard how often, falling from adverse war, it buried its inhabitants in its ruins, through the different attacks of Nabugodonosor, of Titus, or of Adrian ? It was this last who rebuilt Jerusalem, called Helia after his surname, enclosing it with a circular wall of greater compass, that it might embrace the site of the sepulchre of our Lord, which originally stood without : Mount Sion, too, added to the city, stands eminent as a citadel. It possesses no springs ;¹ but water collected in cisterns prepared for that purpose supplies the wants of the inhabitants ; for the site of the city, beginning from the northern summit of Mount Sion, has so gentle a declivity, that the rain which falls there does not form any mire, but running like rivulets, is received into tanks, or flowing through the streets, augments the brook Kedron. Here is the church of our Lord, and the temple which they call Solomon's ; by whom built is unknown, but religiously revered by the Turks ; more especially the church of our Lord, where they daily worshipped, and prohibited the Christians from entering, having placed therein a statue of Mahomet. Here also is a church of elegant workmanship, containing the holy sepulchre, built by Constantine the Great, and which has never suffered any injury from the enemies of our faith, through fear, as I suppose, of being struck by that celestial fire which brightly shines in lamps, every year, on the vigil of Easter.² When this miracle had a beginning, or whether it existed before the times of the Saracens, history has left no trace. I have read in the writings of Bernard³ the monk, that about two hundred and fifty years ago, that is in the year of our Lord 870, he went to Jerusalem, and saw that fire, and was entertained in the hospital which the most glorious Charles the Great had there ordered to be built, and where he had collected a library at great expense. He relates that, both in Egypt and in that place, the Christians under the dominion of the Turks enjoyed such security, that if any traveller lost a beast of burden by accident, in the midst of the high road, he might leave his baggage, and proceed to the nearest city for assistance, and would most certainly find everything untouched at his return. Still, from the suspicion that they might be spies, no foreign Christian could live there securely, unless protected by the signet of the emperor of

² It was pretended that the lamps in the church of the Holy Sepulchre were miraculously ignited on Easter-eve. Mosheim, in his Dissertations on Ecclesiastical History (ii. 214—306), has separately discussed this pretended miracle. He ascribes the invention of the pious fraud to the Franks, soon after the decease of Charlemagne.

³ Bernard with two companions sailed from Italy to Alexandria, and travelled thence by land to Jerusalem in the year 870. Their travels are printed in Maillon's Acta Benedictinorum, iv. 523—526, ed. Paris. The account is short, but has several interesting particulars. There is also a good MS. in the British Museum, Bib. Cott. Faust. B. 1, where, by a mistake of the scribe, it is dated A. D. 970, but this is clearly wrong, for Bernard mentions Lewis king of Italy as then living, and he died A. D. 875. See Hist. Lit. de la France, v. 375.

§ 369. [A. D. 1099.] In the fourth year, then, of the expedition to Jerusalem, the third after the capture of Nicea, and the second after that of Antioch, the Franks laid siege to Jerusalem; a city well able to repay the toils of war, to soothe its labours, and to requite the fondest expectation. It was now the seventh day of June; nor were the besiegers apprehensive of wanting food or drink for themselves, as the harvest was on the ground, and the grapes were ripe upon the vines; the care alone of their cattle distressed them, which, from the nature of the place, and of the season, had no running stream to support them: for the heat of the sun had dried up the secret springs of the brook Siloe, whose refreshing stream only runs at uncertain periods. This brook, when at any time swollen with rain, increases that of Kedron; and then passes on, with impetuous current, into the valley of Josaphat: but this is extremely rare; for there is no certain period for its augmentation or decrease. In consequence, the enemy, suddenly darting from their caverns, frequently killed our people, when straggling abroad for the purpose of watering their cattle. In the meantime the chiefs were each observant at their respective posts; and Raimund actively besieged the tower of David.¹ This fortress, defending the city on the west, and strengthened, nearly half-way up, by courses of squared stone soldered with lead, was a source of confidence against the invaders, although the garrison was small. As they saw, therefore, that the city was difficult to carry on account of the steep precipices, the strength of the walls and the fierceness of the enemy, they ordered engines to be constructed. But before this, indeed, on the seventh day of the siege, they had tried their fortune with scaling-ladders, and shooting arrows against their opponents: but, as the ladders were few, and perilous to those who mounted them, since they were exposed on all sides and nowhere protected from wounds, they changed their design. There was one engine which we call the Sow, the ancients, Vineæ; because the machine, which is constructed of slight timbers, the roof covered with boards and wicker-work, and the sides defended with undressed hides, protects those who are within it, who, after the manner of a sow, undermine the foundations of the walls. There was another, which for want of timber was but a moderate sized tower, constructed after the manner of houses:² they call it Berefreid: this was to equal the summit of the walls in height. The making of this machine delayed the siege, on account of the unskilfulness of the workmen, and the scarcity of wood. And now the fourteenth day of July arrived, when some bringing up the Vineæ began to undermine the wall; others to move forward the tower. To do this more conveniently, they took it towards the works in separate pieces; and putting it together again at such a distance as to be out of bow-shot, it was advanced on wheels, nearly close to the wall. In the meantime, the slingers with stones, the archers with arrows, and the cross-bow-men with bolts, each intent on their department, began to press forward and dislodge their opponents from the ramparts; soldiers too, unmatched in courage, ascend the tower, waging nearly equal war against the enemy with spears and with stones. Nor, indeed, were our foes at all amiss; but trusting their whole security to their valour, they poured down grease and burning oil upon the tower, and slung stones on the soldiers; rejoicing in the completion of their desires, by the destruction of multitudes. During the whole of that day, the battle was such, that neither party seemed to think it had been worsted; on the following, which was the fifteenth of July, the business was decided. For the Franks becoming more experienced from the event of the attack of the preceding day, threw fagots, flaming with oil, on a tower adjoining the wall, and on the party who defended it; the flames blazing by the action of the wind, first seized the timber and then the stones, and drove off the garrison. Moreover, the beams which the Turks had left hanging down from the walls in order that, being forcibly drawn back, they might, by their recoil, batter the tower in pieces, in case it should advance too near, were by the Franks dragged to them, after cutting away the ropes: and being projected from the engine to the wall, and covered with hurdles, they formed a bridge of communication between the ramparts to the tower. Thus, what the infidels had contrived for their defence, became the means of their destruction. Then the enemy, dismayed by the smoky masses of flame and by the courage of our soldiers, began to give way. These advancing on the wall, and thence into the city, manifested the excess of their joy by the strenuousness of their exertions. This success took place on the side of Godfrey and of the two Roberts; Raimund knew nothing of the circumstance, till the cry of the fugitives, and the alarm of the people, throwing themselves from the walls, (who thus met death while flying from it,) acquainted him that the city was taken. On seeing this, he rushed with drawn sword on the runaways, and hastened to avenge the injuries of God, until he had satiated his own animosity. Moreover, having regard to the advantages of immediate repose, he sent unhurt to Ascalon five hundred Ethiopians, who, retreating to the citadel of David, had given up the keys of the gates under promise of personal safety. There was no place of refuge for the Turks, so indiscriminately did the insatiable rage of the victors sweep away both the suppliant and the resisting. Ten thousand were slain in the temple of Solomon; more were thrown from the tops of the churches, and of the citadel. After this, the dead bodies were heaped up, and evaporated by means of fire; lest, putrifying in the open air, they should pour contagion on the flagging atmosphere. The city being thus expiated by the slaughter of the infidels, they proceeded with hearts contrite, and bodies prostrate, to the Sepulchre of the Lord, which they had long so earnestly sought after, and for which they had undergone so many labours. By what ample incense of prayer they propitiated heaven, or by what repentant tears they once again brought back the favour of God, none, I am confident, can describe: no; not if the splendid eloquence of the ancients could revive, or Orpheus himself return; who, as it is said, bent even the listening rocks to his harmonious strain. Be it imagined, then, rather than expressed.

§ 370. So remarkable was the example of forbearance exhibited by the chiefs, that, neither on that, nor on the following day, did any of them, through lust of spoil, withdraw his mind from following up the victory. Tancred alone, beset with ill-timed covetousness, carried off some very precious effects from the temple of Solomon; but, afterwards, reproved by his own conscience, and the address of some other persons, he restored, if not the same things, yet such as were of equal value.¹ At that time, if any man, however poor, seized an house, or riches of any kind, he did not afterwards encounter the brawlings of the powerful, but held what he had once possessed, as his hereditary right. Without delay, then, Godfrey, that brilliant mirror of Christian nobility, in which, as in a splendid ceiling, the lustre of every virtue was reflected, was chosen king;² all, in lively hope, agreeing, that they could in no wise better consult the advantage of the church; deferring, in the meantime, the erection of a patriarch, who was to be appointed by the determination of the Roman Pontiff.³

§ 371. But the emperor of Babylon—not the city built by Nembroth, and said to have been enlarged by Semiramis, but that which Cambyses, son of Cyrus, built in Egypt, on the spot where Thaphnis formerly stood—the emperor of Babylon, I say, venting his long-conceived indignation against the Franks, sent the commander of his forces, to drive them, as he said, out of his kingdom. Hastening to fulfil the command, when he heard that Jerusalem was taken, he redoubled his diligence, though he had by no means been indolent before. The design of the barbarian was to besiege the Christians in Jerusalem, and after the victory, which he falsely presaging, already obtained in imagination, to destroy utterly the Sepulchre of our Lord. The Christians, who desired nothing less than again to endure the miseries of a siege, taking courage through God's assistance, marched out of the city towards Ascalon, to oppose the enemy; and carried with them part of the cross of Christ, which a certain Syrian, an inhabitant of Jerusalem, had produced, as it had been preserved in his house, in succession from father to son. This truly was a fortunate and a loyal device, that the secret should be all along kept from the Turks. Obtaining moreover a great booty of sheep and cattle, near Ascalon, they issued a general order, to leave the whole of it in the open plain, lest it should be an impediment when engaging the next morning, as they would have spoil more than enough if they conquered, so that, free from incumbrance, they might avenge the injuries of heaven. In the morning, therefore, as the army was on its march, you might see, I believe by divine instinct, the cattle with their heads erect, proceeding by the side of the soldiers, and not to be driven away by any force. The enemy perceiving this at a distance, and their sight being dazzled by the rays of the sun, lost their confidence ere the battle could commence, as they thought the multitude of their opponents was countless: yet were they, themselves, by no means deficient in numbers, and by long exercise trained to battle. They endeavoured therefore to hem in the Franks, who were proceeding at a slow rate, by dividing their force into two bodies, and by curving their wings. But the leaders, and more especially Robert the Norman, who was in the advanced guard, eluding stratagem by stratagem, or rather cunning by valour, leading on their archers and infantry, broke through the centre of the heathen. Moreover the Lorrain cavalry, which was stationed with its commander in the rear, advancing by the flanks, prevented their flight, and occupied the whole plain. Thus the Turks, penetrated in the front, and hemmed in on every side, were slain at the pleasure of the victors; the remainder escaping through favour of approaching night. Many golden utensils were found in their camp; many jewels, which, though from their scarcity unknown in our country, there shine in native splendour: nor was there ever a more joyful victory for the Christians, because they obtained the most precious spoil without loss.

² This devout pilgrim rejected the name and ensigns of royalty in a city where his Saviour had been crowned with thorns: he contented himself with the modest title of "Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre."

§ 372. Returning therefore to Jerusalem, when, by a rest of many days, they had recruited their strength, some of them, sighing for their native country, prepared to return by sea. Godfrey and Tancred only remained; princes, truly noble, and to whose glory, posterity, if it judge rightly, never can set limits; men, who, from the intense cold of Europe, plunged into the insupportable heat of the east; prodigal of their own lives, so that they could succour suffering Christianity: who, besides the fears of barbarous incursions, in constant apprehension from the unwholesomeness of an unknown climate, despised the security of rest and of health in their own country; and although very few in number, kept in subjection so many hostile cities by their reputation and prowess. They were memorable patterns, too, of trust in God; not hesitating to remain in that climate, where they might either suffer from pestilential air, or be slain by the rage of the Saracens. Let the panegyrics of the poets then give way; nor let ancient fiction extol her earliest heroes. No age hath produced aught comparable to the fame of these men. For, if the ancients had any merit, it vanished after death with the smoke of their funeral pile, because it had been spent, rather on the vapour of earthly reputation, than in the acquisition of substantial good. But the utility of these men's valour will be felt, and its dignity acknowledged, as long as the world shall revolve, or pure Christianity shall flourish. What shall I say of the good order and forbearance of the whole army? There was no gluttony, no lewdness, which was not directly corrected by the authority of the commanders, or the preaching of the bishops

There was no wish to plunder as they passed through the territories of the Christians ; no controversy among themselves which was not easily settled by the examination of mediators. Wherefore, since the commendation of an army so well ordered, redounds to the glory of its conductors, I will signalize in my narrative the exploits and the adventures of each chief ; nor will I subtract anything from the truth, as I received it on the faith of my relators. But let no one who has had a fuller knowledge of these events accuse me of want of diligence, since we, who are secluded on this side the British ocean, hear but the faint echo of Asiatic transactions.

§ 373. King Godfrey takes the lead in my commendation ; he was the son of Eustace earl of Boulogne, of whom I have¹ spoken in the time of king Edward, but more ennobled maternally, as by that line he was descended from Charles the Great. For his mother, named Ida, daughter of the ancient Godfrey duke of Lorraine, had a brother called Godfrey, after his father, surnamed Bocard. This was at the time when Robert Friso, (of whom I have spoken² above,) on the death of Florence, duke of Friesland, married his widow Gertrude ; advancing Theodoric, his son-in-law, to the succession of the duchy. Bocard could not endure this ; but expelling Friso, subjected the country to his own will. Friso, unable to revenge himself by war, did it by stratagem, killing Bocard through the agency of his Flemings, who drove a weapon into his posteriors as he was sitting for a natural occasion. In this manner the son-in-law succeeded to the duchy, by the means of the victory of his father-in-law. The wife of this Godfrey was the marchioness Matilda, mentioned in the former book,³ who on her husband's death spiritedly retained the duchy in opposition to the emperor ; more especially in Italy, for of Lorraine and the hither-countries he got possession. Ida then, as I began to relate, animated her son Godfrey with great expectations of getting the earldom of Lorraine ; for the paternal inheritance had devolved on Eustace her eldest son ; the youngest, Baldwin, was yet a boy. Godfrey arriving at a sufficient age to bear arms, dedicated his services to the emperor Henry, who is mentioned⁴ in the preceding book. Acquiring his friendship, therefore, by unremitting exertions, he received from the emperor's great liberality the whole of Lorraine as a recompense. Hence it arose that when the quarrel broke out between the pope and Henry, he went with the latter to the siege of Rome ; was the first to break through that part of the wall which was assigned for his attack, and made a great breach for the entrance of the besiegers. Being in extreme perspiration and panting with heat, he entered a subterraneous vault which he found in his way, and by quenching his violent thirst by an excessive draught of wine, brought on a quartan fever. Others say that he fell a victim to poisoned wine, as the Romans and men of that country are used to poison whole casks. Others report that a portion of the walls fell to his lot, where the Tiber flowing, exhales destructive vapours in the morning ; that by this fatal pest, all his soldiers, with the exception of ten, lost their lives ; and that himself, losing his nails and his hair, never entirely recovered. But be it which it might of these, it appears that he was never free from a slow fever, until hearing the report of the expedition to Jerusalem, he made a vow to go thither, if God would kindly restore his health: the moment this vow was made the strength of the duke revived; so that recovering the use of his limbs and rising with expanded breast, and casting off, as it were, his years of decrepitude, he shone with renovated youth. In consequence, grateful for the mercies of God showered down upon him, he went to Jerusalem the very first, or among the first, leading a numerous army to the war: and though he commanded an hardy and experienced band, yet none was esteemed readier to attack, or more efficient in the combat than himself. Indeed it is known, that, at the siege of Antioch, with a sword of Lorrain, he cut asunder a Turk, who had demanded single combat, and that one-half of the man lay panting on the ground, while the horse at full speed, carried away the other; so firmly the miscreant sate. Another also who attacked him he clave asunder from the neck to the groin, by taking aim at his head with a two-handed sword; nor did the dreadful stroke stop here, but cut entirely through the saddle and the back-bone of the horse. I have heard a man of veracity relate that he had seen what I here subjoin. During the siege one of the duke's soldiers had gone out to forage; and being attacked by a lion, avoided destruction for some time by the interposition of his shield: Godfrey, grieved at this sight, transfixing the ferocious animal with an hunting-spear. Wounded, and becoming fiercer from the pain, it turned against the prince with such violence as to hurt his leg with the iron which projected from the wound; and had he not hastened with his sword to rip it up, this pattern of valour must have perished by the tusk of a wild beast. Renowned from these exploits, he was exalted to be king of Jerusalem, more especially because he was conspicuous in rank and courage without being arrogant. His dominion was small and confined, containing, besides the few surrounding towns, scarcely any cities: for the king's bad state of health, which attacked him immediately after the Babylonish war, caused a cessation of warlike enterprise; so that he made no acquisitions; yet, by able management, he so well restrained the avidity of the barbarians for the whole of that year, that nothing was lost. They report that the king, from being unused to a state of indolence, fell again into his original fever; but I conjecture that God, in his own good time, chose early to translate to a better kingdom, a soul, rendered acceptable to Himself and tried by so many labours, lest wickedness should change his heart or deceit beguile his understanding. Revolving time thus completing a reign of one year, he died placidly, and was buried on Mount Golgotha.¹ A king, whose spirit was as unconquerable in death as in battle, often kindly repressing the tears of the by-standers; and when asked who was to succeed him, he mentioned no person by name, but said merely, "whoever was worthy." He never would wear the ensign of royalty, saying that it would be the height of arrogance for him to be crowned for glory, in that city, in which God had been crowned in mockery. He died¹ on the fifteenth of the kalends of August.

§ 374. On Godfrey's decease, Tancred and the other chiefs declared that Baldwin, his brother, who was at that time settled in Mesopotamia, should be king; for Eustace, the elder brother, who came to Jerusalem with Godfrey, had long since returned to his native land. The acts of Baldwin shall be related briefly, but with perfect truth; supported in their credibility by the narrative of Fulcher² of Chartres, who was his chaplain, and wrote somewhat of him, in a style not altogether unpolished, but, as we say, without elegance or correctness, and which may serve to admonish others to write more carefully. Baldwin undertaking the holy pilgrimage with the rest, had for companions many knights of disposition similar to his own; confiding in these associates, he began to levy fresh troops for his purpose; to watch for brilliant opportunities wherein to manifest his prowess; at last, not content with that commendation which was common to all, leaving the rest and departing three days' journey from Antioch, he got possession, by the consent of its inhabitants, of Tarsus, a noble city of Cilicia: Tarsus, formerly the nursing-mother of the apostle Paul, in honour of whom the cathedral there is dedicated. The Tarsians voluntarily submitted to his protection, as they were Christians, and hoped by his aid to be defended from the Turks. The Cilicians, therefore, eagerly yielded to his power, more especially after the surrender of Turbexel, a town fortified by nature, and one whose example sways the inferior towns. This being yielded, as I have said, the others followed its decision. And not only Cilicia, but Armenia and Mesopotamia, eagerly sought alliance with this chief; for these provinces were almost free from the domination of the Turks, though infested by their incursions. Wherefore the prince of the city of Edessa, who was alike pressed by the hatred of the citizens and the sword of the enemy, sent letters to Baldwin, descriptive of his difficulties, desiring him to come with all speed, and receive a compensation for the labour of his journey, by his adoption, as he had no issue of either sex. This is a city of Mesopotamia in Syria, very noted for the fruitfulness of its soil and for the resort of merchants, twenty miles distant from the Euphrates, and an hundred from Antioch. The Greeks call it Edessa, the Syrians Rothasia. Baldwin, therefore, exacting an oath of fidelity from the ambassadors, passed the Euphrates with only eighty horsemen; a thing much to be wondered at, whether we call it courage or rashness, that he did not hesitate to proceed among the surrounding nations of barbarians, whom any other person, with so small a force, would have distrusted either for their race or their unbelief. By the Armenians and Syrians, indeed, coming out to meet him on the road with crosses and torches, he was received with grateful joy and kindly entertained. But the Turks, endeavouring to attack his rear, were frustrated in all their attempts by the skill of Baldwin; the Samosatians setting the first example of flight. Samosata is a city beyond the Euphrates, from which arose Paul of Samosata,¹ the confutation of whose heresy, whoever is desirous may read in the history of Eusebius.² And, if I well remember, Josephus says that Antony was laying siege to this city when Herod came to him. The Turks, inhabiting that city, then, who were the first instigators of outrage against the Franks, were the first to give way. Thus, Baldwin, coming safely to Edessa, found nothing to disappoint his expectations; for being received with surpassing favour by the prince, and soon after, on the latter being killed by his faithless citizens, obtaining the lawful sovereignty of the city, he was engaged in hostilities for the whole time during which the Franks were labouring at Antioch and at Jerusalem; worsting his opponents in repeated attacks. But in the month of November being reminded by Boamund, prince of Antioch, that they ought now to set out for Jerusalem, he prepared for marching, and by the single display of the white standard, which was his ensign in battle, overthrowing the Turks who had broken the peace on his expected departure, he left Antioch to the right, and came to Laodicea. Here, by the liberality of earl Raimund, who presided over the city, getting, at a cheap rate, a sufficiency of supplies for his people, he passed Gibellum, and followed the recent track of Boamund, who had encamped and awaited him. Daibert, archbishop of Pisa, joined them for the march; he had landed his confederate party at Laodicea, as did also two other bishops. These forces when united were estimated at five-and-twenty thousand; many of whom, when they entered the territories of the Saracens, were, through the scarcity of commodities, overtaken by famine, and many were dismounted from their horses being starved. Their distress was increased by an abundance of rain; for in that country it pours down like a torrent in the winter months only. In consequence, these poor wretches, having no change of garments, died from the severity of the cold, never getting under cover during several successive days. For this calamity, indeed, there was no remedy, as there was a deficiency both of tents and of wood; but they in some measure appeased their hunger by constantly chewing the sweet reeds which they call Cannamel;³ so denominated from Cane and Honey. Thus, twice only, obtaining necessaries at an exorbitant price from the inhabitants of Tripoli and Cæsarea, they came to Jerusalem on the day of the winter solstice. They were met at the gates by king Godfrey with his brother Eustace, whom he had detained till this time, who showed them every degree of respect and generosity. Having performed in Bethlehem all the accustomed solemnities of our Lord's nativity, they appointed Daibert patriarch; to which transaction I doubt not that the consent of pope Urban was obtained; for he was reverend from age, eloquent, and rich. After the circumcision of our Lord, therefore, assuming palms¹ in Jericho, which antiquity has made the ensign of pilgrims, each one hastily endeavoured to reach his home. The cause of their speed was the stench of the unburied dead bodies, the fumes of which exhaled in such a manner as to infect the sky itself. In consequence, a contagious pestilence spreading in the atmosphere, swept off many of the new comers. The rest quickened their march, by the cities on the coast, that is to say, Tiberias and Cæsarea Philippi; for they were urged by scantiness of provision and the fear of the enemy. Their want, as I have said, was remedied by the celerity of their march; and to the fury of three hundred soldiers who harassed them from the town of Baldac, they opposed a military stratagem: for feigning flight for a short time, that by leaving the narrow passes themselves they might induce the Turks to enter them, they retreated purposely, and then returning, routed the straggling enemy at their pleasure. They had supposed our people unprepared for fight, as their shields and bows were injured by the excessive rains; not being aware, that among men, victory is not obtained by reliance on arms, or armour, but by the predominance of mental energy and bare physical exertion.

² Fulcher wrote an account of the transactions in Syria, where he was present, from A. D. 1095 to A. D. 1124. Malmesbury condenses much of his narrative with his usual ability. It is printed in the Gesta Dei per Francos, and, ap. Duchesne, Hist. Franc. Scriptor. tom. iii.

§ 375. At that time, indeed, Baldwin returned safely to Edessa, and Boamund to Antioch. But in the beginning of the month of July, a vague report reached the ears of Baldwin, that the pearl of our princes was shorn of its splendour; Boamund being taken, and cast into chains by one Danisman, an heathen, and a potentate of that country. In consequence, collecting a body of the people of Edessa and Antioch, he was in hopes of revenging this singular disgrace of the Christians. Moreover the Turk (who had taken this chieftain more by stratagem and chance than by courage or military force, as he had come with a small party to get possession of the city of Mellentinia) aware that the Franks would use their utmost efforts against him for the disgrace of the thing, betook himself to his own territories: marshalling his troops, not as though he intended to retreat, but rather to exhibit a triumph. Baldwin then proceeding two days' march beyond Mellentinia, and seeing the enemy decline the hazard of a battle, thought fit to return; but, first, with the permission of Gabriel the governor, brought over the city to his own disposal.

lecting two hundred horse and seven hundred foot, he proceeded on a march pregnant with death and danger; whence many, whom he falsely supposed faithful, as soon as they saw what a hazardous attempt it was, clandestinely deserted. He, with the remainder, marched forward to Antioch, where, from the resources of his sagacious mind, he became the cause of great future advantage to this distressed people, by advising them to choose Tancred as their chief. Thence he came to Tripoli, by the route of Gibel and Laodicea. The governor of this city, a Turk by nation, but naturally of a kind disposition, afforded him the necessary provisions without the walls; at the same time kindly intimating that he should act cautiously, as Ducah, king of Damascus, had occupied a narrow pass through which he had heard he was to march. Ashamed of being moved by the threats of the Saracen, he resolutely proceeded on his destination: but when he came to the place, he found that the governor's information was correct; for about five miles on this side the city of Berytus there is a very narrow passage near the sea, so confined by steep precipices and narrow defiles, that were an hundred men to get possession of the entrance, they might prevent any number, however great, from passing. Such a travel from Tripoli to Jerusalem have no possible means of avoiding it. Baldwin, therefore, arriving on the spot, sent out scouts to examine the situation of the place and the strength of the enemy. The party returning, and hardly intelligible through fear, breathlessly related the difficulty of the pass, and the confidence of the enemy who had occupied it. But Baldwin, who fell little short of the best soldier that ever existed, feeling no alarm, boldly drew up his army and led it against them. Ducah then despatched some to make an onset, and lure the party unguardedly forward, retaining his main body in a more advantageous position. For this purpose at first they rushed on with great impetuosity, and then made a feint to retreat, to entice our people into the defile. This stratagem could not deceive Baldwin, who, skilled by long-continued warfare, made a signal to his men to make show of flight; and to induce a supposition that they were alarmed, he commanded the baggage which they had cast down to be again taken up, and the cattle to be goaded forward, as well as the ranks to be opened, that the enemy might attack them. The Turks at this began to exult, and, raging so horribly that you might suppose the furies yelling, pursued our party. Some getting into vessels took possession of the shore, others riding forward began to kill such pilgrims as were incautiously loitering near the sea. The Franks continued their pretended flight till they reached a plain which they had before observed. No confusion deprived these men of their judgment; even the very emergency by which they had been overtaken nurtured and increased their daring; and though a small body, they withstood innumerable multitudes both by sea and land. For, the moment it appeared they had sufficiently feigned alarm, they closed their ranks, turned their standards, and hemmed in the now-charging enemy on all sides: thus the face of affairs was changed, the victors were vanquished, and the vanquished became victors.

The Turks were hewn down with dreadful carnage; the remainder anxiously fled to their vessels, and when they had gotten more than a bow-shot out to sea, they still urged them forward as fiercely with their oars, as though they supposed they could be drawn back to land by their adversaries' hands. And, that you may not doubt that this was a real and not a fancied miracle, this victory was obtained by the loss of only four Christian soldiers. Wherefore, I assert, that the Christians would never be conquered by the pagans, were they to implore the Divine assistance on their courage ere they entered the conflict; and, when in battle, conciliate the friendly powers of heaven to their arms. But since in peace they glut themselves in every kind of vice, and in battle rely only upon their courage, therefore, it justly happens that their valour is often unsuccessful. The earl then, rejoicing in his splendid victory, on returning to spoil the slain, found several Turks alive, whom he dismissed without personal injury, but despoiled them of their wealth. To avoid any hidden stratagem, he, that night, retreated with his party, and rested under the shelter of some olive-trees. Next day, at dawn, he approached the defile with the light troops, to survey the locality; and finding everything safe, and making a signal by smoke, as had been agreed upon, he intimated to his associates the departure of the enemy; for the Turks, who the day before were wantonly galloping around the hill, perceiving the carnage of their companions, had all fled in the dead of the night. Laying aside every delay, they instantly followed their commander. The governor of Berytus sent them food on their march, astonished at the valour of so small a force. The Tyrians, and Sidonians, and Acharonites, who were also called Ptholoamites, acted in the same manner; venerating, with silent apprehension, the bravery of the Franks. Nor were Tancred's party, in Caiphaz, less generous, although he was absent. The ancient name of this town I am unable to discover, because all the inland cities, which we read of in Josephus as formerly existing, are either not in being, or else, changed into inconsiderable villages, have lost their names; whereas those on the coast remain entire. In this manner, by Cæsarea of Palestine, and Azotus, they came to Joppa. Here he was first congratulated on his kingdom, the citizens with great joy opening the gates to him.

§ 377. Being afterwards accompanied by the inhabitants of Joppa to Jerusalem, where he was favourably received, he indulged in a repose of seven days. Then, that the Turks might be convinced that the spirit of his reign would tend to their signal disadvantage, he led his troops towards Ascalon. When at a short distance from that city, he proudly displayed his forces, and with very little exertion compelled the attacking Ascalonites to retreat; waiting a favourable opportunity for accomplishing his designs. Finally, conceiving his glory satisfied for that time by their repulse, he drew off to the mountains to pursue the enemy, and also, at their expense, to procure necessaries for his troops, who were famished with hunger from the barrenness of the land; for a scanty harvest had that year denied sustenance, deceiving the expectations of the province by a meagre produce. He ascended, therefore, the mountainous districts, whither the Turkish inhabitants of the country had retreated on leaving their towns, concealing the Syrians with them in sequestered caverns. The Franks, however, discovered a mode of counteracting the device of the fugitives, by filling the caverns with smoke; by which the miscreants were dislodged, and came out one by one. The Turks were killed to a man; the Syrians were spared. The army turning aside thence, and marching towards Arabia, passed by the sepulchres of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and of their three wives, Sarah, Rebecca, Leah. The place is in Hebron, thirteen miles distant from Jerusalem; for the body of Joseph lies at Neapolis, formerly called Sichem, covered with white marble, and conspicuous to every traveller; there, too, are seen the tombs of his brothers, but of inferior workmanship. The army then came into the valley where God formerly overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, darting fire from heaven on the wicked. The lake there extends for eighteen miles, incapable of supporting any living creature, and so horrible to the taste as to distort the mouths of such as drink it, and distend their jaws with its bitter taste. A hill overhangs the valley, emitting, in various places, a salt scum, and all over transparent, as it were with congealed glass: here is gathered what some call nitre, some crystal salt. Passing the lake, they came to a very opulent town, abundant in those luscious fruits which they call dates; in devouring which they were hardly able to satisfy their hunger or restrain the greediness of their palates, they were so extremely sweet. Everything else had been taken away, through the alarm of the inhabitants, except a few Ethiopians, the dark wool of whose hair resembled smut; whom our people, (thinking it beneath their valour to kill persons of this description,) treated, not with indignation, but with contempt. Beneath this town is a valley, where, to this day, is seen the rock which Moses struck, to give water to the murmuring tribes. The stream yet runs so plentifully, and with such a current, as to turn the machinery of mills. On the declivity of the hill stands a church, built in honour of the law-giver Aaron: where, through the mediation and assistance of his brother, he used to hold converse with God. Here learning from guides conversant in the roads, who from Saracens had been converted to Christianity, that from hence to Babylon was all barren country, and destitute of every accommodation, they returned to Jerusalem, to consecrate to God the first-fruits of a kingdom acquired by the subjugation of so many hostile countries.

§ 378. The royal insignia being prepared, Baldwin was crowned with great ceremony, in Bethlehem, on Christmas-day,¹ by Daibert the patriarch; all wishing him prosperity. For both at that time and afterwards, he deserved, by his own exertions, and obtained, through the favour of others, every degree of royal respect, though sovereign of a very small, and I had almost said, a despicable kingdom. Wherefore the Christians ought to regard the mercy of our Lord Christ, and to walk in the contemplation of his power, through whose assistance they were objects of apprehension, though unable to do harm ; for there were scarcely in the whole service four hundred horsemen and as many foot, to garrison Jerusalem, Ramula, Caiphas, and Joppa. For those who came thither by sea, with minds ill at ease amid so many hostile ports, after having adored the saints, determined to return home, as there was no possibility of proceeding by land. Moreover, an additional difficulty was, that in the month of March, Tancred had departed to assume the government of Antioch, nor could he or the king aid each other, by reason of the length of the journey ; indeed, should necessity require it, neither of them could, without fear of irreparable loss, march his troops from one town to another. I pronounce it therefore to be a manifest miracle, that, safe alone through God's protection, he was an object of dread to such a multitude of barbarians.

§ 379. In this year, (which was A. D. 1101,) the sacred fire which used to signalize the vigil of Easter, delayed its appearance longer than usual. For on the Saturday, the lessons being read, alternately in Greek and Latin, the "Kyrie eleeson" repeated thrice ; and the fine Syrian music resounding, still when no fire appeared, and the sun was setting, the night closing in, then all departed sorrowful to their homes. It had been determined after mature deliberation, that on that night no person should remain in the church of the holy sepulchre, lest any impure person should irritate God still more, through his irreverent intrusion. But at day-break, a procession of the Latins was ordered to the Temple of Solomon, that by prayer they might invoke the mercy of God : the same was performed around the sepulchre of our Lord, by the Syrians, plucking their beards, and hair, through violence of grief. The mercy of God could endure no longer, light being instantly sent into one lamp of the sepulchre. When a Syrian perceived it glittering through a window, he expressed his joy by the clapping of his hands, and accelerated the advance of the patriarch. He, opening the recess of the sepulchral chamber by the keys which he carried, and lighting a taper, brought forth the celestial gift,¹ imparting it to all who crowded round him for that purpose ; afterwards the whole of the lamps, throughout the church, were divinely lighted up, the one which was next to be illumined evidencing its approaching ignition, by emitting smoke in a miraculous manner. Thus, doubtless, the constant manner of Christ has been to chasten those whom He loveth, that He may again kindly soothe them, and that the dread of his power may redound to his praise. For since even the common gifts of God are lightly esteemed by men, merely from their constant recurrence, He often enhances the grant of his indulgences by withholding them, in order that what is most ardently desired may be more gratefully regarded.

§ 380. At that time a fleet of Genoese and Pisans had touched at Laodicea, and thence made a prosperous voyage to Joppa ; and the crews, drawing their vessels on shore, spent Easter with the king at Jerusalem. He, bargaining for their services, engaged to give them the third of the spoil of each city they could take, and any particular street they might choose. Thus he impelled them, inconsiderate and blinded, more through lust of gold than love of God, to barter their blood, and lay siege immediately to Azotus, which they constrained to surrender after three days. Nor did the townspeople yield very reluctantly, as they feared the anger of the king, should they be taken by storm; for, the preceding year, assisted by the machination of fortune, they had vigorously repulsed Godfrey when making a similar attempt; for when, by means of scaling-ladders, he had advanced his forces on the walls, and they, now nearly victorious, had gotten possession of the parapet, the sudden fall of a wooden tower, which stood close to the outside of the wall, deprived them of the victory and killed many, while still more were taken and butchered by the cruelty of the Saracens. Leaving Azotus, Baldwin laid siege to Cæsarea of Palestine, with his whole force and with determined courage; but perceiving the resolution of its citizens, and the difficulty of the enterprise, he ordered engines to be constructed. Petrarics were therefore made, and a great tower built, twenty cubits higher than the wall. Our people, however, impatient of delay and of such lingering expectation, erecting their ladders, and attempting to overtop the wall, arrived at the summit by the energy of their efforts; indignant, with conscious valour, that they had now been occupied in conflict with the Saracens during fifteen days, and had lost the whole of that time; and although the Cæsareans resisted with extreme courage, and rolled down large stones on them as they ascended, yet despising all danger, they broke through the close ranks of their opponents, using their strength of arm and their drawn swords. The Turks, unable longer to sustain the attack, and taking to flight, either cast themselves down headlong, or fell by the hand of their enemies. Many were reserved for slavery; a few for ransom: among the latter was the governor of the city, and a bishop named Archadius. It was a laughable spectacle for a by-stander, to see a Turk disgorging bezants,¹ when struck on the neck by the fist of a Christian; for the wretched males, through fear of extreme indigence, had hid money in their mouths; the females, in parts not to be particularized: you perceive that my narrative blushes to speak plainly, but the reader understands what I wish, or rather what I wish not, to express.

§ 381. Still, however, the emperor of Babylon could not be at rest, but would frequently send commanders and armies to attack the Franks. Arriving at Ascalon on ship-board, they scoured about Ramula, taking advantage of the king's occupation, who was then busied in the contest with Cæsarea. They frequently, therefore, by depopulating the country, irritated him to engage. But he, with equal subtlety, that their mad impetuosity might subside, suffered them, when eagerly advancing, to grow languid by declining battle: by this procrastination he caused many, weary of delay, to withdraw; he then attacked the remainder, consisting of eleven thousand horse and twenty-one thousand infantry, with his own two hundred and fifty cavalry and less than seven hundred foot. Addressing a few words to his soldiers, to whom he pledged victory if they persevered, and fame if they fell; and calling to their recollection, that if they fled France was a great way off, he dashed first against the enemy; and, the contest continuing for some time, when he saw his ranks giving way, he remedied circumstances which seemed almost bordering on desperation. Thus, dismaying the Turks by his well-known appearance, he laid their leader prostrate with his lance; on whose death the whole army fled. Our soldiers, who in the onset were so hemmed in as to be unable to see each other, then exercised their valour in such wise, under the ensign of the Holy Cross which preceded them, that they killed five thousand. Eighty of the cavalry, and rather more of the infantry, were slain on the side of the Franks. However, subsequent successes consoled them, as they dispatched five hundred Arabian horse. These had been traversing before Joppa for two days; but effecting little, they were returning to Ascalon, and seeing our troops at a distance, and hoping they were their own, were approaching to congratulate them on their victory: but at length perceiving by the weapons hurled against them that they were Franks, they turned pale; and to use the words of the poet,¹ became like him, who,

In consequence, unnerved with astonishment, they fled before their destroyers. Thus, the king coming to Joppa, corrected, by a true account, the falsity of the letter which had been sent to Tancred by the people of that city, erroneously declaring that the king had perished with his army. And, indeed, already had Tancred prepared for his march to Jerusalem; when a messenger arriving, and showing the royal signet, dispelled his sorrow, and restored his satisfaction.

§ 382. It would be tedious were I to relate all his contests; to tell how he subdued Tiberias, Sidon, Accaron, that is Ptolemais, and, ultimately, all the cities on the coast; or, how he distinguished almost each day by the slaughter of the Turks, either through secret attack or open warfare. The relation of his exploits requires the exclusive labours of a man of lofty eloquence, and undisturbed leisure: I have neither; and, what chiefly acts as an obstacle, want clear information on the subject. For it is by no means the part of an historian of veracity to give entire credit to flattering reports, or to deceive the credulity of his readers. Consequently, I shall only subjoin what I have found recorded, whereby this man's exalted devotion may be clearly proved, and his good report live for ever.

This I may be bold to assert, that he often, with an inconsiderable force, engaged in mighty conflicts, and that he never fled from the field, except at Ramula and at Accaron. And indeed signal victories ensued to each of these flights, because they proceeded more from rash valour than from fear; as the reader will discover from the insertion of a few facts.

§ 383. In the month of September, on the seventh of the ides of which [Sep. 7th], the battle aforesaid took place, William, earl of Poitou, proceeded towards Jerusalem, leading with him a large army estimated at sixty thousand¹ horse and a still larger number of foot. There accompanied him, Stephen, earl of Burgundy, and Hugh de Lusignan, brother of earl Raimund, Hugh the Great, and Stephen of Blois, anxious to atone for the disgrace of their former desertion, by renovated and determined valour. Proceeding, therefore, by Constantinople, after he had by an insolent answer, as I² before related, offended Alexis, he fell into the snares of Solyman; the emperor rather procuring than preventing his disaster. For Solyman, aware that the army was suffering from hunger and thirst, as they had been wandering about the marshes and desolate places for several days, encountered them with three hundred thousand archers. Never was there conflict more disastrous to the Franks; as it was impossible for flight to save the coward, or courage to rescue the bold from danger: for the battle was fought in a confined situation, and nothing could prevent the effect of clouds of arrows on men who were crowded together. More than an hundred thousand were slain; and all the booty carried off. Thus Solyman, obtaining splendid offerings to the manes of his countrymen from the spoils of the Franks, revenged the loss of Nicea. But, as they had proceeded by many roads, all were not slain; nor was everything plundered. For, except the Poictevin, who was nearly stript to the skin, the other earls had boldly defended their baggage. All, therefore, except Hugh the Great, who died, and was entombed in the city of Tarsus, collecting again their soldiers after the flight, hastened to Antioch. Tancred, a knight of distinguished piety, gave them ample proof of his generosity; assisting them all, as far as he was able, with money: more especially William, whom the inconstancy of fortune had now as deeply depressed as she had formerly highly exalted, who, in addition to the loss of treasure, by which he was not so much affected, as it was transitory and capable of reparation, was left almost the sole survivor of so many valorous soldiers. Proceeding on their march with renovated courage, they sought every opportunity of giving battle. The city of Tortosa was the first to feel their rage; by attacking and plundering which, they in a great degree compensated their former losses. Thence they came to the defile, which I have mentioned above, where the king had long waited them, in order to give assistance in case the Turks should oppose their passage. Defended by his valour, and meeting with kind entertainment at Joppa, they proceeded the following Easter to Jerusalem, where they joyfully beheld, and reverently adored, the sacred fire. Returning afterwards to Joppa, they took ship, each designing to revisit his native land. The Poictevin, the wind being favourable all the way, reached home; the rest were violently driven back.

§ 384. But now, in the beginning of May, the Turks and Arabs laid siege to Ramula; recruiting the losses of their army in the former year, by making up its original numbers. The bishop of the city, prudently watching an opportunity, retired from the place and went secretly to Joppa. Baldwin had already gone out, relying on a false assertion that the enemy did not exceed five hundred: in consequence of which, he neither put his forces in order, nor called out his infantry, the trumpeters merely sounding for the cavalry to follow the king; though his friends earnestly advised him to be on his guard against the subtlety of the Turks. The two Stephens, him of Blois, and the other of Burgundy, followed the king on horseback, that, instead of being branded as indolent and cowardly, they might return to their respective homes partakers of the credit of the triumph; far different, however, from their expectations, were the glory and the victory which the fates were preparing for them. For Baldwin, perceiving the multitude of the enemy and finding himself deceived in his opinion, filled with rage, and fierce in conscious valour, hesitated what was to be done. If he gave way, he saw that his former renown would be tarnished; if he fought, he foresaw the destruction of his followers. Nevertheless, his innate courage prevailed, and fear had already yielded, when, swayed by the advice of his comrades, he acquiesced in a plan of retiring, through the midst of the enemy, into a castle. The rest, following with loud clamour, broke through the thickest ranks, consecrating their souls to God, and selling their lives dearly; the earls, too, so wearied with striking that their hands grew stiff upon their swords, were slain. The king escaping to the fortress, had some few companions remaining out of the two hundred he had led forth: who entreating that he would deign to protract his life by flight, and observing that their danger was of little consequence to the world, while his life was of advantage to many, inasmuch as he would be an example of valour to every age, by his singular constancy in adversity, he consented to save himself. Wherefore, accompanied by five knights, he eluded his assailants by stealing away to the mountains. One of them was an Englishman named Robert, as I said before; the remoteness of time and place has left us in ignorance of the names of the others: he, with three more, was taken; the fifth escaped with the king. The Turks vented the whole of their fury on those who had retired to the castle, among whom was Hugh de Lusignan and Geoffrey de Vincennes: only three survivors told their mournful tale to the people of Jerusalem. The king, concealing himself during the day, urged his jaded courser and arrived at Azotus, by the singular and miraculous protection of God; as the Turks had but just departed, after having been plundering around the city for the space of two days. Coming thence by sea to Joppa, he despatched a letter to the people of Jerusalem, assuring them of his safety. The bearer of the epistle was a low Syrian fellow, who, even had he been discovered, would have deceived the enemy, from the meanness of his garb, and his using the common language of the country. Escaping the hands of the infidels by lone paths with which he was acquainted, he arrived the third day at Jerusalem. Upon this the cavalry who garrisoned the city, taking with them the bands of auxiliary infantry, and purposing to proceed to Joppa, took a route close to the sea; avoiding the inland districts: the rear, however, of the party, were cut off by the Turks pressing on them, as they were left unprotected either by horse or foot. Thus collecting ninety horse from Jerusalem, and eighty from Tiberias, which Hugh, that most intrepid commander, had brought to their assistance, the attendants also, through necessity, were advanced to the rank of knights. The battle was delayed only till the next day, the Turks being now so ferocious as to prepare their engines, and to meditate an attack on the walls of Joppa. This was prevented by the activity of Baldwin, and by the Cross of Christ preceding them, which had been wanting in the former battle. They then, with all the forces, rushed eagerly on the enemy, and the contest was fierce; but they, after their usual custom, surrounding our troops, thought they had completely overcome the Christians, and shouted with cheerful cry: but the Lord Jesus was present, who at length looked down from heaven, and inspiriting the Franks, put the enemy, driven from the field, to flight. It had happened in the preceding action, that, though frequently driven from their tents, they afterwards conquered through their numbers; but now, as the infantry wounded them from a distance with their arrows, and the cavalry close at hand with their lances, they relied only on their speed, and continued their flight.

§ 385. He fought another battle in later years, in which our soldiers, pressed by the numbers of the Turks and compelled to fly, lost even their protecting standard: but after they had fled some distance, they rallied; shame animating the timid to repel such ignominy. Then indeed the contest was strenuous; fighting foot to foot, and breast to breast. Our party recovered the Cross; routing the enemy, and regaining the field. Many fell here with whom I had been acquainted; among these was Godfrey, Baldwin's bastard grand-nephew, who from a boy manifested valour in his countenance, and truth in his soul. In the beginning, indeed, both retreats were, it may be said, the source of ignominy; but in the end, true food for glory: the one more celebrated; the other more advantageous. Finally, to repair his losses and also to be united with him in marriage, the countess of Sicily came shortly after to Jerusalem, pouring such treasures into the royal palace, that it was matter of surprise whence a woman could accumulate such endless heaps of precious utensils:¹ and at this time, indeed, he married her, but shortly after he put her away. It is said that she was afflicted with a cancerous complaint, which preyed upon her womb.²

This, however, is well known, that the king had no issue ; nor is it wonderful, that a man to whom leisure was burthensome should be averse to the embraces of a wife, as he passed all his time in war. By these exertions his admirable, and almost godlike valour, operated as an incitement to the present race, and was a marvel to posterity. He died, during an expedition into Arabia, in the month of April, and was publicly buried at Jerusalem, near his brother, in the fourth month of the eighteenth year of his reign [A. D. 1118.] He was a man who gained his reputation by repeated labours, and on whose fame envy hath cast no shade, except it be, that he was too sparing of his money ; though there is a ready and well-founded excuse for such a fault, if it be considered, that the necessary largesses to such as remained with him prevented him from purchasing the favour of those who departed.

§ 386. He was succeeded by his kinsman, Baldwin, prince of Edessa, already celebrated for his former campaigns, whom he had, when dying, named as king. Spiritedly defending the kingdom for many years, he augmented it with the sovereignty of Antioch, which he obtained when Roger, the son of Richard, was killed.¹ He governed both countries with laudable conduct ; with less presumptuous haughtiness, perhaps, but with great and consummate prudence ; though there are some who wound his fair fame, accusing him of excessive parsimony. Wherefore, last year, when the Turks had taken him while riding a short distance from Jerusalem, his people grieved but little for him, and for nearly a year it remained unknown both to subjects and even to tale-bearers, whither he was taken, or whether or not he was still alive. However, the people of Jerusalem, nothing discouraged on account of his absence, refused either to elect a king, or to change the order or command of the army, till the certainty of the matter could be known. At last, the place where he lay captive being discovered, some knights of surpassing boldness, assuming the guise of merchants, and hiding weapons beneath their garments, entered the town, and rescued the king from jeopardy ; protesting that they did not act thus through respect for his niggardliness, but out of gratitude to Gozelin of Turbexel,² who never hesitated to bestow all he possibly could upon the military. He has now lived long, a provident man, and subject to no other imputation.³ The princi-year 1105, and confined in the convent of St. Anne of Jerusalem, was then living. The marriage with the countess of Sicily, his third wife, was therefore set aside by the pope ; after which she returned, in 1117, to Sicily, and died there, shortly after Baldwin. (Albertus Aquen. xii. xxiv. ; Will. Tyr. ii. i. and xv.) His first wife who accompanied him on the Crusade, but died before her arrival at Antioch, was the daughter of Raoul II. lord of Toëni, and had been separated from her former husband, Robert comte de Meulent.

² This account appears in some measure incorrect. Gozelin and the king were both confined in the same castle. On its being seized, Gozelin escaped, and collected troops to liberate his friends, who were now themselves besieged. But ere his arrival, the Turks had made themselves masters of the fortress, and carried off the king, who did not recover his liberty for some time, and then only by paying a considerable ransom. Fulch. Carnot. and Will. Tyr. ap. Gesta Dei.

§ 387. Boamund² was the son of Robert Guiscard by a Norman woman; he had another son named Roger,³ born of an Apulian, who was, by his father, surnamed "Purse," because his paternal and attentive observation had discovered that, from a mere child, he had pleasure in counting money. As to Boamund, who was somewhat older, he never could retain anything, but even gave away his childish presents. Roger, therefore, received Apulia, which seemed to belong to him in right of his mother; Boamund went with his father to the Durazzian war. And when the townspeople, through confidence of their walls, boasted that the city was called Durachium,⁴ because it could endure all sieges undismayed; and, "I," said Guiscard, "am called Durandus; and I will remain besieging it, until I take away the name from the city; so that henceforth it shall no longer be called Durachium, but Mollicium." The firmness of this answer so terrified them that they immediately opened their gates. Thus, secure in his rear, he subdued, with the less difficulty, the other cities as far as Thessalonica. He had now arrived there, and had already, both by himself and by his son, taught Alexis that he might be overcome; when, beguiled by the treachery of his wife, he failed, by death, of a noble enterprise. Boamund, then, returning to Apulia, possessed some castles through his brother's indulgence, and acquired many others by his own courage and prudence. Indeed the dukedom had fallen to his brother only in appearance; all the most warlike spirits following him. Nor was this of light importance; for, observant of his father's purpose, he was averse to Guibert and strongly espoused the cause of Urban, urging him when hesitating, to proceed into France to the council of Clermont, whither the letters of Raimund earl of Provence and of the bishop of Chorges invited him. The council being ended, he readily embraced the opportunity, and transported his forces into Greece; and thence moving forward his army, he quietly awaited Raimund and Godfrey. Joining them on their arrival, he inspired the rest with great confidence by reason of his military skill and courage, which was never surpassed. But, as what he performed in company with others only entitles him to a share in the general praise, and my former narrative has⁵ related how he had been taken prisoner, it may be proper to mention in what manner he rescued himself from captivity. When Danisman perceived that no advantage resulted to him from detaining so great a man in confinement, changing his intentions, he began sedulously to treat of terms of peace; for he was neither inclined to put him to death, lest he should concentrate the fierce hatred of the Christians on himself; nor would he set him at liberty¹ without the hope of a lasting peace. Boamund, therefore, promising the infidel perpetual amity, returned to Antioch, bringing with him the silver fetters with which he had been confined; and being favourably received by his people, he took possession of Laodicea, and the other cities which Tancred, lest he should have been thought slumbering in indolence while his uncle was sighing in prison, had acquired during his captivity. Not long after he came into France, offering up, in honour of St. Leonard,² the chains with which he had been burdened; for this saint is said to be so especially powerful in loosing fetters that the captive may freely carry away his chains, even in the sight of his enemies, who dare not mutter a syllable. Then, marrying one of the daughters of the king of France and sending another to Tancred, he sought Apulia, followed by the French nobility, who deserted their country in hope of greater advantages, as well as that they might be eye-witnesses of what could be effected by that energetic valour which was so universally extolled by fame. Wherefore arranging his affairs in Apulia, he again attacked Alexis, alleging as a cause his cruelty to the crusaders, for which he was very noted: but being deceived by the subtlety of the emperor, who, as I have already mentioned, alienated his commanders from him by bribery, or took them off by poison, he had little or no success. Dejected at this, he returned to Apulia, where, in a few days, while purposing to proceed to Antioch, he died, not an old man, yet equal to any in prudence, leaving a son of tender age. He was a man firm in adversity and circumspect in prosperity; for he had even provided himself with a preservative from poison of which he was apprehensive. It was a knife, which, placed before him when eating, strange to tell, indicated, by the moistness of its handle, whenever poison was brought into the apartment. After him Tancred succeeded to the principality of Antioch, a nephew worthy of such uncle; he treading the common path of mortals by an early death, Roger the son of Richard succeeded. Though rivalling the fame of his predecessors in battle, yet he incurred the disgrace of being avaricious: in consequence of this, when the soldiery avoided him, he engaged the Turks with a trifling stipendiary, and a small native force, and fell selling his life dearly; for being taken by them, stripped of his armour, and commanded to yield up his sword, he refused to deliver it to any but the commander, as he considered all present unworthy to receive the surrender of one of his dignity. The unhappy chief gave credit

² Leonard was godson to Clovis king of France, and obtained, through the favour of that monarch, that, whenever he should see any one who was in chains, he should be immediately set at liberty. At length it pleased God to honour him to that degree, that, if any person in confinement invoked his name, their chains immediately fell off, and they might depart; their keepers themselves having no power to prevent them. Vide Surius Vitæ Sanct. Nov. 6.

to his specious words, and having taken off his helmet, stretched out his hand to receive Roger's sword; when, indignant, and mustering all his remaining powers for the effort, he cut off the Turk's head, and being immediately stabbed, escaped the disgrace of slavery by the act his courage had suggested. Baldwin the Second, king of Jerusalem, revenging his death in a signal manner, faithfully reserved the dominion of the city, and his own daughter,¹ for Boamund the son of Boamund.

§ 388. Raimund was the son of the most noble William,² count of Tholouse, who being a man of enterprise and ability, rendered his country, which had been obscured through the indolence of his predecessors, illustrious by his own good qualities. His wife, Almodis,³ was repeatedly married to different persons, and had a numerous issue by them all; a woman of such sad, unbridled lewdness, that, when one husband became disgusting to her from long intercourse, she would depart and take up her abode with another; to sum up all, she had been first united to the count of Arles;⁴ presently, becoming weary of him, she connected herself with this William; and then, after bearing him two sons, she lured the earl of Barcelona⁵ to marry her. Moreover, William, when at the point of death, gave to his son of his own name, but not of his own disposition, the county of Tholouse, because, though he was of slender talents, the people of Tholouse would attempt no innovation against him, as they were accustomed to the government of his family. But Raimund, who was of brighter abilities, received Querci, and increased it not a little by the addition of Arles, Narbonne, Provence, and Limoges. Again, he purchased Tholouse of his brother, who went to Jerusalem many years previous to the grand crusade; but these things were achieved by a considerable lapse of time, and a life expended on the labour. Thus, ever engaged in war, he had no desire for a legitimate wife, enjoying himself in unrestrained concubinage. Finally, he condescended to honour with his adoption and inheritance, Bertrand, his son by one of his mistresses; as he, in some respects, resembled his father. To this son he married the niece⁶ of Matilda the Marchioness, a native of Lombardy, that by such affinity he might secure his possessions on that side. In the latter part of his life, too, he himself espoused the daughter of the king of Tarragona, covenanting for a noble dowry, namely, the perpetual peace of the adjacent provinces. Soon after this, on contemplating his grey hairs, he made a vow to go to Jerusalem, in order that his bodily powers, though decayed and feeble, might still, though late, enter into the service of God. The chief promoter of this was the bishop of Chorges, by whose especial exertions he had always been thwarted; he had also lost an eye in a duel, which deformity, so far from concealing, he was ever anxious to show, boasting of it, as a proof of his valour. But now, leagued in mutual friendship, that they might employ their old age in religious services, they stimulated Urban, already inclined to preach the crusade, to pass the Alps and summon a council at Clermont, more especially as it was a city adjacent to their territories, and convenient for persons coming from every part of France. The bishop, however, died on his way to the council. To his influence succeeded the bishop of Puy, of whom we have before spoken: animated by whose advice, and protected by whose assistance, Raimund was the first layman who assumed the cross, making this addition to his vow, that he would never return to his country; but endeavour to lessen the weight of his past offences by perpetual exertion against the Turks. He had already given many proofs of his prowess on the way, being the first to labour and the last to rest; many also of forbearance, as he readily relinquished those places he had first occupied at Antioch to Boamund, and the Tower of David to Godfrey. But at length, his patience being worn out by the unreasonable demands of certain persons, he departed from his usual practice on the subject of the surrender of Ascalon. For, on the first arrival of the Franks, the townspeople, examining the disposition of our several commanders made choice of him for their patron; because many men, who had come thither before, by sea, from Montpellier, to trade, had extolled his sincerity and courage to the skies. In consequence, delivering him their keys, they compelled him to make oath that he would never give up the command of the city to any other of the Christians, should he himself be either unwilling or unable to retain it. A murmuring then arose among the chiefs, who required the surrender of the city to the king, saying that his kingdom would be of little value unless he had possession of Ascalon, which would be a receptacle for the enemy and an obstacle to our party. The king indeed set forth the matter mildly, as he did everything else, with a placid countenance, consistent with his manners; the others rather more violently. However, he paid little attention to their words, obviating their allegations by very substantial reasons, saying that all his associates had secured a place of retreat, part of them had returned home, part were occupying the provinces they had acquired; that he alone, having abjured his native country, could neither return thither, nor did he possess a place of refuge here; that he had yielded in other points, but they must allow him to retain Ascalon, under fealty to the Holy Sepulchre, as he had taken an oath not to give it up. On hearing this, all began to clamour and to call him interested and faithless; indeed, they could scarcely abstain from laying hands on him. The earl, indignant at this reproach, failed in the duty of a just and upright man, delivering the keys to the enemies of God, and compensating the fear of perjury by the blood of many a man in after time; for, to this day, that city has never been taken, either by force or by stratagem. Moreover, many of his people, delighted with the unbounded affluence of the place, by denying their faith obtained the friendship of its citizens. Thus leaving Jerusalem, he came to Laodicea, and having subdued it, continued there some little time. Afterwards, when he had gone to Constantinople, Tancred obtained Laodicea, though it is dubious whether by force or favour. In the meantime, remaining at Byzantium, he contrived by his consummate prudence to insinuate himself into the favour of Alexis: whence it happened, that, through the kindness of the emperor, getting a safe passage, he escaped sharing those calamities which, as we have before related, befel William of Poictou and the others, with whom he took the city of Tortosa, and, when the rest proceeded onwards, retained possession of it. To extend his power, he fortified a town over against Tripoli, called Pilgrim's Castle, where he appointed abbot Herbert, bishop: and that the shattered strength of his followers might recruit by repose, he made a seven years' league with the Tripolitans. Nevertheless, ere the time appointed, the peace was broken, on account of a certain townsman being found within the castle, with a poisoned dagger concealed beneath his garments. And now truly would he have put the finishing hand to the conquest of Tripoli, had he not died just as he was on the point of accomplishing his great designs. On learning his decease, William of Montpelier, and the other chiefs of the province, provided that William the pilgrim, scarcely four years of age, whom he had begotten on a Spanish woman during the siege, should be conveyed home, to be educated for the succession, in accordance with the universal desire. Nor did Bertrand hear of this transaction with displeasure, although he had never been consulted, as it enabled him to renew his father's fame. Wherefore, heading a vast army, and chiefly supported by the Genoese and Pisans, who were allied to his wife, he attacked Tripoli by sea and land, and, when exhausted by a protracted siege, reduced it to his dominion. To him succeeded Pontius, his son by a Lombard woman, a youth who rivalled the glory of his ancestors, and who obtained in marriage the relict of Tancred, formerly prince of Antioch. This, when dying, he had commanded, affirming that the youth would grow up a support to the Christians and an utter destruction to the Turks. Pontius therefore reigns at Tripoli, professing himself the servant of the Holy Sepulchre; in this respect following the example of his grandfather and father.

§ 389. Robert, son of William the First, king of England, was born in Normandy, and already considered as a youth of excellent courage when his father came to England; of tried prowess, though of small stature and projecting belly. He passed his early years amid the warlike troops of his father, obedient to him in every respect: but in the vigorous heat of youth, led by the suggestions of his idle companions, he supposed he could obtain Normandy from the king during his lifetime. But when William refused this, and drove away the youth by the blustering of his terrific voice, Robert departed indignantly, and harassed his country by perpetual attacks. His father laughed at first, and then added, "By the resurrection of God, this little Robin Short-hose will be a clever fellow;" for such was his appellation from his small stature, though there was nothing else to find fault with, as he was neither ill-made, nor deficient in eloquence, nor was he wanting in courage or resources of mind. At length, however, the king was so transported with anger, that he denied him his last blessing and the inheritance of England; and it was with difficulty and disgrace that he could retain even Normandy. After nine years he gave proof of his valour in the labours of the crusade, and in many battles it was matter of wonder that neither Christian nor pagan could ever unhorse him. More especially was he remarkable in the battle of Antioch, where he graced the victory by a singular achievement. For when the Turks, as we have related, were suddenly dismayed and fled, and our party vehemently attacked them in disorder, Corbaguath, their leader, mindful of his native valour, checked his horse, and rallied his people; calling them base slaves, and forgetful of their ancient conquests, in suffering themselves, the former conquerors of the East, to be driven from their territories by a strange and almost unarmed people: at this reproach, many, resuming their courage, wheeled round, attacked the Franks, and compelled the nearest to give way, while Corbaguath continued to animate his men and to assault the enemy, nobly fulfilling his duty, both as a commander and a soldier. But now the Norman earl and Philip the Clerk, son of Roger, earl of Montgomery, and Warin de Taney, a castle so named in Maine, who had before made a feint of retreating, exhorting each other with mutual spirit, turned round their horses, and each attacking his man, threw them to the ground. Here Corbaguath, though he knew the earl, yet estimating him merely by his size, and thinking it inglorious to fly, paid the penalty of his bold attack, being instantly slain. The Turks, who had already raised a shout of victory, on seeing his fall, now lost their lately-acquired hopes, and redoubled their flight. In this contest Warin fell: Robert, with Philip, gained the victory. The latter, who acquired renown by this service, but afterwards, as they report, closed an honourable career at Jerusalem, was celebrated for his learning as well as his military prowess. Robert, thus coming to Jerusalem, tarnished his glory by an indelible stain in refusing a kingdom¹ offered to him, as a king's son,² by the consent of all; and this, as it is asserted, not through awe of its dignity, but through the dread of its complicated duties. However, returning home, where he had reckoned on giving himself up to the full indulgence of sensual pleasure, God mercifully visited him, as I believe, for this transgression; everywhere thwarting him, and turning all his enjoyments into bitterness, as will be manifested by the sequel. His wife, the daughter of William de Conversana, whom he had married in Apulia on his return, and whose surpassing beauty all endeavours to describe are vain, he lost after a few years by disease;¹ she being misled, as it is said, by the advice of the midwife, who had ordered her breasts, when in childbed, to be bound with a tight bandage, on account of the copious flow of her milk. A great consolation, however, in this extreme distress was a son by his consort, who, called William by presage of his grandfather's name, gave hope of noble talents hereafter. The immense sum which his father-in-law had given him, under the appellation of dowry, that he might with it redeem Normandy,² he lavished so profusely, that, in a few days, he was penniless. He accelerated his disgrace by his ill-advised arrival in England to wrest the kingdom from his brother Henry; but, failing of the assistance of the traitors who had invited him, he easily yielded to his brother's terms of peace; which, by the agreement of the chiefs of either party, were, but only verbally, that he should receive an annual present of three thousand marks from England. The king, indeed, promised this without any design of paying it; but, aware of his brother's easiness, trifled with his soft credulity, till his warlike passion should subside. And he, too, as if contending with Fortune whether she should give or he squander most, discovering the mere wish of the queen, who silently entreated it, kindly forgave the payment of this immense sum for ever, thinking it a very great matter that female pride should condescend to ask a favour. The queen was his god-daughter, so he would not bear in mind his wrongs: moreover his disposition was to forgive faults beyond what he ought to have done: he answered all who applied to him exactly as they wished, that he might not send them away sorrowful, and promised to give what was out of his power. By this suavity of disposition, he who ought to have acquired the commendations and the love of his subjects, so excited the contempt of the Normans, that they considered him as of no consequence whatever; for then all the nobility were at variance one with another, plunder was universal, and the commonalty were pillaged. Although the inhabitants laid their injuries before the duke, they gained no kind of redress; for though incensed at first, yet his anger was soon appeased, either by a trifling present or the lapse of time. Roused, however, by the extremity of their distresses, they determined to implore the assistance of king Henry to their suffering country. He, abiding by Cæsar's axiom,³ "That if justice is ever to be violated, it ought to be violated in favour of the citizens, but that you must be observant of duty in other points," transported his forces several times into Normandy to succour expiring justice, and at last was successful enough to subjugate the whole country, with the exception of Rouen, Falaise, and Caen. Robert was now reduced so low, as to wander, hardly to be recognised, through these towns, obtaining a precarious subsistence from the inhabitants. Disgusted at this, the people of Caen did not long regard their fidelity, but sending messengers to the king, they closed the gates of their city with locks and bolts. Robert learning this, and wishing to escape, was hardly allowed to depart; his attendant, with the furniture of his chamber, being detained. Thence flying to Rouen, he had a conference with his lord, the king of France, and his relation, the earl of Flanders, on the subject of assistance; but obtaining none, he determined, as his last resource, to risk a general action. Fortune being unfavourable to him, he was taken prisoner, and was kept, by the laudable affection of his brother, in free custody till the day of his death; for he endured no evil but solitude, if that can be called solitude where, by the attention of his keepers, he was provided with abundance both of amusement and of food. He was confined, however, till he had survived all his companions in the crusade, nor was he liberated to the day of his death. He was so eloquent in his native tongue, that none could be a more pleasant companion; in other men's affairs no man could counsel better, in military skill equal to any, yet, through the easiness of his disposition was he ever esteemed unfit to have the management of the state. But since I have already said all that I knew of Hugh the Great, and of the counts of Blois and of Flanders, I think I may, very properly, here conclude my fourth book.

² The crown for the same reason might also have been offered to Hugh the Great, brother of king Philippe of France, but he had embraced an ambiguous opportunity of returning to his own country. Guibert (pp. 518, 523) attempts to excuse Hugh the Great.

PREFACE, TO BOOK V.

WE have now come in the due course of events to the times of king Henry, to transmit whose actions to posterity requires an abler hand than ours. For, were only those particulars recorded which have reached our knowledge, they would weary the most eloquent, and might overload a library. Who, then, will attempt to unfold in detail all his profound counsels, all his royal achievements? These are matters too deep for me, and require more leisure than I possess. Scarcely Cicero himself, whose eloquence is venerated by all the western world, would attempt it in prose; and in verse not even a rival of the Mantuan Bard. In addition to this, it is to be observed, that while I, who am a man of retired habits, and far from the secrets of a court, withhold my assent from doubtful relators, being ignorant of his greater achievements, I touch only on a few events. Wherefore it is to be feared, that where my information falls beneath my wishes, the hero, many of whose exploits I omit, may appear to suffer. However, for this, if it be a fault, I shall have a good excuse with him who bears in mind that I could not be acquainted with the whole of his transactions, nor ought I to relate even all that I did know : the insignificance of my condition effects the one ; the disgust of my readers would be excited by the other. This fifth book, then, will display some few of his deeds, while fame, no doubt, will blazon the rest, and lasting memory transmit them to posterity. Nor will it deviate from the design of the preceding four, but will particularise some things which happened during his time, here and elsewhere, which perchance are either unrecorded, or unknown to many ; they will occupy, indeed, a considerable portion of the volume, while I must claim the usual indulgence for long digressions as well in this as in the others.

THE FIFTH BOOK OF WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF THE KINGS OF ENGLAND.

BOOK V.

Of Henry the First.

§ 390. HENRY, the youngest son of William the Great, was born¹ in England, the third year after his father's arrival ; a child, even at that time, fondly cherished by the joint good wishes of all, as being the only one of William's sons born in royalty, and to whom the kingdom seemed to pertain. The early years of instruction he passed in liberal arts, and so thoroughly imbibed the sweets of learning that no warlike commotions, no pressure of business, could ever erase them from his noble mind. Although he neither read much openly, nor displayed his attainments except sparingly, yet his learning, (as I can affirm,) though obtained by snatches, assisted him much in the science of governing ; according to that saying of Plato, "Happy would be the commonwealth, if philosophers were kings, or kings would be philosophers." Thus, not slightly imbued with philosophy, he learnt by degrees, and in process of time, how to restrain the people with lenity, and never to suffer his soldiers to act but where he saw a pressing emergency. In this manner, by learning, he trained his early years to the hope of the kingdom ; and often, in his father's hearing, made use of the proverb, that "An illiterate king is a crowned ass." They relate, too, that his father, observing his disposition, never omitted any means of cherishing his lively prudence ; and that once, when he had been ill-used by one of his brothers, and was in tears, he spirited him up by saying, "Weep not, my boy, you too will be a king."

he was nineteen years of age, he was knighted by him at Westminster during Pentecost; and then accompanying him to Normandy, was, shortly after, present at his funeral; the other brothers departing whither their hopes led them, as my former¹ narrative has related. Wherefore, supported by the blessing of his father, together with his maternal inheritance and immense treasures, he paid little regard to the haughtiness of his brothers, assisting or opposing each of them according to their merits. More attached, however, to Robert, by reason of his mildness, he took every means of correcting his lenity by his own severity. Robert, on the other hand, through blameable credulity, trusting to tale-bearers, injured his innocent brother in a way which it may not be irrelevant briefly to relate.

§ 392. At the time when the nobility of England were rebelling against William the Second, while Robert was waiting a wind to sail over from Normandy, Henry had, by his command, departed into Brittany. Then, eagerly seizing the opportunity, he expended on his troops all the large sum of money, amounting to three thousand marks, which had been bequeathed to the young man by the will of his father. Henry, on his return, though perhaps indignant at this, yet observed a cautious silence on the subject. However, hearing of the restoration of peace in England, the service was ended, and they laid aside their arms. The earl retired to his own territories; Henry to those which his brother had either given or promised to give him. Indeed he placed his promises to account, retaining the tower of Rouen under fealty to Robert. But, by the accusation of some infamous persons, his fidelity proved disadvantageous to him; and, for no fault on his part, Henry was, in this very place, detained in free custody, lest he should escape the vigilance of his keepers. Released at the expiration of half-a-year, on the invitation of his brother William he offered him his services; but he, remunerating the young man no better, put him off, though in distress, with empty promises for more than a year. Wherefore, Robert, by his messengers, offering reparation for what had been done, he came to Normandy, having experienced the treachery of both his brothers. For the king, angry at his departure, had in vain commanded him to be detained; and the earl, swayed by the arts of his accusers, had changed his intention; so that, when lured to him by soothing measures, he would not easily suffer him to depart. But he, escaping every danger by the providence of God and his own cautious expedition, compelled his brother gladly to accede to peace, by seizing Avranches and some other castles. Soon after, William coming into Normandy to revenge himself on his brother Robert, Henry manifested his regard to the earl at Rouen. Finally, the king's party, coming thither in the day-time, he spiritedly expelled them, when already, through the treachery of the citizens, they had overrun the whole city, sending a message to the earl to oppose them in front, while he pressed upon their rear. In consequence of this transaction one Conan was accused of treachery to the earl, who designed to cast him into chains, supposing that no greater calamity could be inflicted on the wretch, than dooming him to drag out an hated existence in prison. This Conan, then, Henry requested to have committed to his care, which being granted he led him to the top of the tower at Rouen, and ordering him carefully to survey the surrounding territory from the heights of the citadel, ironically declaring it should all be his, he thrust him suddenly off the ramparts into the Seine below, protesting to his companions, who at the same time assisted him, that no respite was due to a traitor, that the injuries of a stranger might be endured in some manner or other; but that the punishment of a man who turned traitor after swearing fealty and doing homage, should never be deferred. This action weighed little with Robert, who was a man of changeable disposition, for he immediately became ungrateful, and compelled his deserving brother to retire from the city. This was the period in which, as has been before mentioned,¹ Henry, as well for his security as for his fame, made a stand against both Robert and William at Mount St. Michael. Thus, though he had been faithful and serviceable to either brother, they, vouchsafing no establishment to the young man, trained him up, as he grew in years, to greater prudence, from the scantiness of his means.

§ 393. But on the violent death of king William, as before related,² after the solemnization of the royal funeral, he was elected king; though some trifling dissensions had first arisen among the nobility, which were allayed chiefly through the exertions of Henry earl of Warwick, a man of unblemished integrity, with whom he had long been in the strictest intimacy. He immediately promulgated an edict³ throughout England, annulling the illegal ordinances of his brother and of Ralph; he remitted taxes, released prisoners, drove the flagitious from court, restored the nightly use of lights within the palace, which had been omitted in his brother's time, and renewed the operation of the ancient laws, confirming them with his own oath, and that of the nobility, that they might not be eluded. A joyful day then seemed to dawn on the people, when the light of fair promise shone forth, after such repeated clouds of distress. And that nothing might be wanting to the universal joy, Ralph, that sink of iniquity, was cast into the gloom of a prison,⁴ and speedy messengers were despatched to recall Anselm. Wherefore, all vying in joyous acclamation, Henry was crowned king at London, on the nones of August [Aug. 5], four days after his brother's death. These acts were the more sedulously performed, lest the nobility should be induced to repent their choice, as a rumour prevailed that Robert earl of Normandy, returning from Apulia, was just on the point of arriving. Soon after, his friends, and particularly the bishops, persuading him to give up meretricious pleasures and take a lawful wife, he married,⁵ on St. Martin's-day [11 Nov.],

Matilda, daughter of Malcolm king of Scotland, to whom he had long been greatly attached, little regarding the marriage portion, provided he could possess her whom he so ardently desired. For though she was of noble descent, being grand-niece of king Edward, by his brother Edmund, yet she possessed but little fortune, being an orphan, destitute of both parents; of her there will be more ample matter of relation hereafter.

§ 394. In the meantime, Robert, arriving in Normandy, recovered his earldom without any opposition; on hearing which, almost all the nobility of this country violated the fealty they had sworn to the king: some without any cause; some feigning slight pretences, because he would not readily give them such lands as they coveted. Robert Fitz-Haimon, and Richard de Rivers, and Roger Bigod, and Robert count of Meulan, with his brother Henry, alone declared on the side of justice. But all the others either secretly sent for Robert to make him king, or openly branded their lord with sarcasms; calling him Godric,¹ and his consort, Godgiva. Henry heard these taunts, and, with an angry grin, deferring his anger, he repressed the contemptuous expressions cast on him by the madness of fools, by a studied silence; a calm dissembler of hatred, but, in due season, a fierce avenger. This tempest of the times was increased by the subtlety of Ralph. For, concerting with his butler, he procured a rope to be sent him. The servant who was water-bearer, (alas! what treachery) carried him a very long one in a cask; by which he descended from the wall, no one regarding whether he strained his arms, or hurt his hands. Escaping thence to Normandy, he stimulated the earl, already indignant and ripe for war, to come to England without a moment's delay.

§ 395. In the second year, then, of Henry's reign, in the month of August, arriving at Portsmouth, he landed, and divided and posted his forces over the whole district. The king was not indolent, but collected an innumerable army over against him, with which, if necessary, to assert his dignity. For, though the nobility deserted him, yet was his party strong; being espoused by archbishop Anselm, with his brother bishops, and all the English. In consequence, grateful to the inhabitants for their fidelity, and anxious for their safety, he frequently went through the ranks, instructing them how to elude the ferocity of the cavalry by opposing their shields, and how to return their strokes: by this he made them perfectly fearless of the Normans, and ask to be led out to battle. Men, however, of sounder counsel interfering, who observed, that the laws of natural affection must be violated should brothers meet in battle, they turned their minds to peace; reflecting, that if one fell, the other would be the weaker, as there was no other surviving brother. Besides, a promise of three thousand marks deceived the easy credulity of the earl; who imagined that, when he had disbanded his army, he might gratify his inclinations with called at Lambeth by archbishop Anselm, and it was there determined that, not having voluntarily become a nun, she might marry according to the law of God. See Eadmer, pp. 56, 57.

§ 396. The following year Robert de Belesme, eldest son of Roger de Montgomery, rebelled, fortifying the castles of Bridgenorth and Arundel against the king; carrying thither corn from all the district round Shrewsbury, and every necessary which war requires. The castle of Shrewsbury, too, joined the rebellion, the Welsh being inclined to evil on every occasion. In consequence, the king, firm in mind and bearing down every adverse circumstance by valour, collecting an army, laid siege to Bridgenorth, whence Robert had already retired to Arundel; presuming from the plenty of provision and the courage of the soldiers, that the place was abundantly secure: but, after a few days, the townsmen, impelled by remorse of conscience and by the bravery of the king's army, surrendered: on learning which, Arundel took a humbler tone; and submitted to the king, with this remarkable condition; that its lord, without personal injury, should be suffered to retire to Normandy. Moreover, the people of Shrewsbury sent the keys of the castle to the king by Ralph, at that time abbot of Sees, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, as tokens of present submission, and pledges of their future obedience. Thus, this fire of dissension, which was expected to become excessive, wasted to ashes in the course of very few days; and the avidity of the revolters, perpetually panting after innovation, was repressed. Robert, with his brothers, Ernulph, who had obtained the surname of his father, and Roger the Poictevin, so called because he had married his wife from that country, abjured England for ever; but the strictness of this oath was qualified with a proviso, "unless he should satisfy the king on some future occasion, by his obedient conduct."

§ 397. The torch of war now lighted up in Normandy, receiving fresh fuel by the arrival of the traitors, blazed forth and seized every thing within its reach. Normandy, indeed, though not very wide in its extent, is a convenient and patient fosterer of the abandoned. Wherefore, for a long time, she well endures intestine broils; and on the restoration of peace, becomes more flourishing than before; at her pleasure ejecting her disturbers, who feel themselves no longer safe in the province, by the open passes into France. Whereas England does not long endure the turbulent; but when once received to her bosom, either surrenders, or puts them to death; neither, when laid waste by tumult, does she again soon recover herself. The earl of Belesme, then, arriving in Normandy, had, both at that time and afterwards, accomplices in his malignity, and lest this should seem too little, inciters also. Among others was William earl of Moretol, the son of Robert, the king's uncle. He, from a boy, had been envious of Henry's fame, and had, more especially on the arrival of the Norman, manifested his evil disposition: for not content with the two earldoms, of Moretol in Normandy and Cornwall in England, he demanded from the king the earldom of Kent, which Odo his uncle had held; so troublesome and presumptuous was he, that, with shameless arrogance, he vowed, that he would not put on his cloak till he could procure the inheritance derived to him from his uncle ; for such was his expression. But even then the king, with his characteristic circumspection, beguiled him by the subtlety of an ambiguous answer. The tumult, however, being allayed and tranquillity restored, he not only refused assent to his demand, but persisted in holding what he unjustly retained ; though he did it with moderation, and under cover of legal proceedings, that none of his actions might appear illegal, or contrary to equity. William, ousted by the sentence of the law, retired, indignant and furious, into Normandy. Here, in addition to his fruitless attacks upon the royal castles, he assailed Richard earl of Chester, the son of Hugh ; invading, plundering, and destroying some places which formed part of his possessions : the earl himself being at that time a minor, and under the protection and guardianship of the king.

§ 398. These two persons, then, the leaders of faction and fomenters of rebellion, in conjunction with others whom I am ashamed to particularise, harassed the country far and wide with their devastations. Complaints from the suffering inhabitants on the subject of their injuries, though frequent, were lavished upon the earl in vain : he was moved by them, it is true ; but fearing, on his own account, lest they should disturb his ease if offended, he dissembled his feelings.¹ King Henry, however, felt deeply for his brother's infamy, carried to the highest pitch by the sufferings of the country : aware, that it was the extreme of cruelty, and far from a good king's duty, to suffer abandoned men to riot on the property of the poor. In consequence, he once admonished his brother, whom he had sent for into England, with fair words ; but afterwards, arriving in Normandy, he severely reminded him, more than once, by arms, to act the prince rather than the monk. He also despoiled William, the instigator of these troubles, of everything he had in England ; razing his castles to the ground. But when the king could, even thus, make no progress towards peace, he deliberated long and anxiously, whether, regardless of fraternal affection, he should rescue the country from danger, or through blind regard suffer it to continue in jeopardy. And indeed the common weal, and sense of right, would have yielded to motives of private affection, had not pope Paschal, as it is said,² urged him, when hesitating, to the business by his letters : averring, with his powerful eloquence, that it would not be a civil war, but a signal benefit to a noble country. In consequence, passing over,³ he, in a short time, took, or more properly speaking, received, the whole of Normandy; all flocking to his dominion, that he might provide, by his transcendent power, for the good of the exhausted province. Yet he achieved not this signal conquest without bloodshed; but lost many of his dearest associates. Among these was Roger of Gloucester, a tried soldier, who was struck on the head by a bolt from a cross-bow, at the siege of Falaise; and Robert Fitz-Haimon,¹ who receiving a blow on the temple with a lance, and losing his faculties, survived a considerable time, almost in a state of idiocy. They relate, that he was thus deservedly punished, because, for the sake of liberating him, king Henry had consumed the city of Baieux, together with the principal church, with fire. Still, however, as we hope, they both atoned for it: for the king munificently repaired the damage of that church: and it is not easy to relate, how much Robert enriched, by his favour, the monastery of Tewkesbury; where the splendour of the edifice, and the kindness of the monks, attract the eyes, and captivate the minds of the visitors. Fortune, however, to make up for the loss of these persons, put a finishing hand to the war, when at its height, and, with little labour, gave his brother, when opposing him with no despicable force, together with William earl of Moretol, and Robert de Belesme, into his power. This battle was fought at Tenerchebrei, a castle of the earl of Moretol's, on Saturday,² the-Vigil of St. Michael. It was the same day on which, about forty years before, William had first landed at Hastings: perhaps by the wise dispensation of God, that Normandy should be subjected to England on the same day that the Norman power had formerly arrived to subjugate that kingdom. Here was taken the earl of Moretol, who came thither to fulfil his promise of strenuous assistance to the townsmen, as well as in the hope of avenging his injuries: but, made captive, as I have related, he passed the residue of his life in the gloom of a prison; meriting some credit from the vivacity of his mind, and the activity of his youth, but deserving an unhappy end, from his perfidy. Then, too, Belesme escaped death by flight at the onset; but when, afterwards, he had irritated the king by secret faction, he also was taken; and being involved in the same jeopardy with the others, he was confined in prison as long as he lived.³ He was a man intolerable from the barbarity of his manners, and inexorable to the faults of others; remarkable besides for cruelty; and, among other instances, on account of some trifling fault of its father, he blinded his godchild, who was his hostage, tearing out the little wretch's eyes with his accursed nails: full of cunning and dissimulation, he used to deceive the credulous by the serenity of his countenance and the affability of his speech; though the same means terrified those who were acquainted with his malignity; as

§ 399. The king, thus splendidly successful, returned triumphant to his kingdom, having established such peace in Normandy as it had never known before; and such as even his father himself, with all his mighty pomp of words and actions, had never been able to accomplish. Rivalling his father also, in other respects, he restrained, by edict,¹ the exactions of the courtiers, thefts, and the violation of women; commanding the delinquents to be deprived of sight, and castrated. He also displayed singular diligence against the mintmasters, commonly called moneyers; suffering no counterfeiter, who had been convicted of deluding the ignorant by the practice of his roguery, to escape, without losing his hand.

§ 400. Adopting the custom of his brother, he soothed the Scottish kings by his affability: for William made Duncan, the illegitimate son of Malcolm, a knight; and on the death of his father, appointed him king of Scotland. When Duncan was murdered by the wickedness of his uncle Donald, he promoted Edgar to the kingdom; the above-mentioned Donald being dispatched by the contrivance of David, the youngest brother, and the power of William. On Edgar's death, Henry bound Alexander, his successor, with the tie of affinity, giving him his illegitimate daughter in marriage, by whom he had no issue, that I know of; and when she died, he did not much lament her loss: for there was, as they affirm, some defect about the lady, either in correctness of manners, or elegance of person. Alexander resting with his ancestors, David, the youngest of Malcolm's sons, whom the king had made an earl and honoured with the marriage of a woman of quality, ascended the throne of Scotland;—a youth more courtly than the rest, and who, polished from a boy by intercourse and familiarity with us, had rubbed off all the rust of Scottish barbarism. Finally, when he obtained the kingdom, he released from the payment of taxes, for three years, all such of his countrymen as would pay more attention to their dwellings, dress more elegantly, and feed more nicely. No history has ever recorded three kings, and at the same time brothers, who were of equal sanctity, or savoured so much of their mother's piety; for independently of their abstemiousness, their extensive charity, and their frequency in prayer, they so completely subdued the domestic vice of kings, that no report even prevailed, that any entered their bed except their legitimate wives, or that either of them had ever been guilty of any unlawful intercourse. Edmund was the only degenerate son of Margaret, who, partaking in his uncle Donald's crime, and bargaining for half his kingdom, had been accessory to his brother's death. But being taken, and doomed to perpetual imprisonment, he sincerely repented; and, on his near approach to death, ordered himself to be buried in his chains: confessing that he suffered deservedly for the crime of fratricide.

repeated expeditions by king Henry, who, relying on a prudent expedient to quell their tumults, transported thither all the Flemings then resident in England. For that country contained such numbers of these people, who, in the time of his father, had come over from national relationship to his mother, that, from their numbers, they appeared burdensome to the kingdom: in consequence, he settled them, with all their property and connexions, at Ross, a Welsh province, as in a common receptacle, both for the purpose of cleansing the kingdom and repressing the brutal temerity of the enemy. Still, however, he did not neglect leading his expeditions thither, as circumstances required: in one of which being privily aimed at with an arrow from a distance, though by whose audacity is unknown, he opportunely and fortunately escaped, thanks to the good mail of his hauberk and the counsel of God, which at the same time frustrated this treachery. The man who shot the arrow was not then discovered, nor could he ever after be detected; although the king immediately declared that it was not discharged by a Welshman, but by a subject; swearing to it by the death of our Lord, which was his customary oath, when moved either by excess of anger or the importance of the occasion; for at that very time the army was marching cautiously and slowly upon its own ground, not in an enemy's territory, and therefore nothing less was to be expected than an hostile attack. But, nevertheless, he desisted not from his purpose, through fear of intestine danger, until the Welsh appeased his regal wrath, by giving the sons of their nobility as hostages, together with some money and much of their substance.

§ 402. By dint of gold, too, he brought the inhabitants of Brittany to his views, whom, when a young man, he had had as neighbours to his castles of Danfront and Mount St. Michael. These are a race of people, poor at home, and seeking abroad the support of a toilsome life from foreign hire: regardless of right and of affinity, they decline not even civil war, provided they are paid for it; and, in proportion to the remuneration, are ready to enter any service that may be offered. Aware of this custom, if at any time he had need of stipendiary troops, he used to lavish money on these Bretons; thereby hiring the faith of a faithless nation.

§ 403. In the beginning of his reign he offended Robert, earl of Flanders, from the following cause: Baldwin the Elder, the grandfather of this Robert, had powerfully assisted William, when going to England, by the wisdom of his counsels, for which he was famed, and by a supply of soldiers. William had frequently made splendid returns for this; giving, every year, as they report, three hundred¹ marks of silver to his father-in-law, on account of his fidelity and affinity. This munificence was not diminished towards his son Baldwin; though it was dropped through the evil disposition of Robert le Frison, as my history has already recorded.² Moreover, this Robert, the son of Frison, easily obtained the omitted largess from William the Second; because the one alleged his relationship, and the other possessed a boundless spirit in squandering money. But Henry giving the business deeper consideration, as a man who never desired to obtain money improperly, nor ever wantonly exhausted it when acquired, gave the following reply to Robert, on his return from Jerusalem, when imperiously making a demand, as it were, of three hundred marks of silver: He said, that the kings of England were not accustomed to pay tribute to the Flemings; and that he would not tarnish the liberty of his ancestors by the stain of his cowardice; therefore, if he would trust to his generosity, he would willingly give him, as a kinsman and as a friend, whatever circumstances would permit; but if he thought proper to persist in his demand, he should refuse it altogether. Confuted by this reasoning, he, for a long time, cherished his indignation against Henry: but getting little or nothing by his enmity, he bent his mind to milder measures; having discovered that the king might be wrought upon by entreaty, but not by imperious insolence. But now, the change of times had given his son, Baldwin, matter of offence against Henry: for wishing to place William, the son of Robert the Norman,¹ in his inheritance, he voluntarily busied himself in the affairs of others, and frequently made unexpected attacks upon the king's castles in Normandy: he threatened extreme trouble to the country, had the fates permitted: but engaging at Arques² with a larger party of soldiers than he had apprehended, he met his death; for his helmet being battered with repeated strokes, he received an injury in his brain. They relate, that his disorder was increased from having that day eaten garlic with goose; and that he did not even abstain from carnal intercourse at night. Here let posterity contemplate a noble specimen of royal attention: for the king sent a most skilful physician to the patient, bewailing, as we may believe, that one should perish by disease, whom, through admiration of his valour, he had rather seen survive. Charles, his successor, never annoyed the king; and first, with a doubtful, but afterwards, a formal treaty, embraced his friendship.

§ 404. Philip, king of France, was neither friendly nor hostile to our king, being more intent on gluttony than business; neither were his dominions situated in the vicinity of Henry's castles; for the few which he possessed at that time in Normandy were nearer to Brittany than France. Besides, as I have said before,³ Philip growing in years, was oppressed by lust, and, allured by the beauty of the countess of Anjou,⁴ was enslaved to illicit passion for her. In consequence of his being excommunicated by the pope, no divine service could be celebrated in the town where he resided; but on his departure the chiming of the bells resounded on all sides, at which he expressed his stupid folly by laughter, saying, "You hear, my fair, how they drive us away." He was held in such contempt by all the bishops of his kingdom, that no one, except William, archbishop of Rouen,¹ would marry them: the rashness of which deed he atoned for by being many years interdicted, and was with difficulty, at last, restored to apostolical communion by archbishop Anselm. In the meanwhile, no lapse of time could give satiety to Philip's mad excess, except that in his last days, being seized with sickness, he took the monastic habit at Flory.² She acted with better grace and better success, as she took the veil at Fontevrault, while yet possessed of strength and health, and undiminished beauty; she soon afterwards departed this life; God, perhaps, foreseeing that the frame of a delicate woman could not endure the austerities of a nunnery.

² Historians differ both as to the place where Baldwin was wounded, and where he died, and even as to the time of his death; but it seems that he passed the last ten months of his life in the monastery of St. Bertin, where he was buried. Meyerus (Ann. Fland. lib. iv. ad an. 1119), cited in Bouquet, xiii. 14, gives an account of Baldwin.

§ 405. Louis, the son of Philip, was very changeable; firmly attached to neither party. At first, extremely indignant against Robert, he instigated Henry to seize Normandy; seduced by what had been plundered from the English, and the vast wealth of the king. Not, indeed, that the one offered it, but the other invited him, exhorting him, of his own accord, not to suffer the nerves of that once most flourishing country to be crippled by his forbearance. But an enmity afterwards arose between them, on account of Thibaut, earl of Blois, son of Stephen, who fell at Ramula, by Adala, daughter of William the Great. For a considerable time messengers on the part of our king were frequently despatched, entreating that Louis would condescend to satisfy Thibaut. But he paying little regard to entreaties, caused Thibaut to be excommunicated by the pope, as arrogant and a rebel to God; who, in addition to the austerity of his manners, which seemed intolerable to all, was represented as depriving his lord of his hereditary possessions. Their quarrel being thus of long continuance, when, each swollen with pride, neither would veil his consequence to the other, Louis entered Normandy, devastating everything with overbearing violence. These things were reported to the king, who shut himself up in Rouen until the common soldiers infested his ears by saying,—That he ought to allow Louis to be driven back; a man who formerly kept his bed through corpulency, but was now, by Henry's forbearance, loading the very air with threats. The king, mindful of his father's example, rather preferred crushing the folly of the Frenchman by procrastination, than repelling it by force. Moreover he kindly soothed his soldiers by addressing them to the following effect, That they ought not to wonder if he avoided lavishing the blood of those whom he had proved to be faithful by repeated trials: that it would be impious in achieving power to himself, to glory in the deaths of those persons who had devoted their lives to voluntary conflicts for his safety; that they were the adopted of his kingdom, the foster-children of his affection, wherefore he was anxious to follow the example of a good king, and by his own moderation to check the impetuosity of those whom he saw so ready to die for him. At last, when he beheld his forbearance wrongly interpreted, and denominated cowardice, inso-much that Louis burnt and plundered within four miles of Rouen; he called up the powers of his soul with greater effort, and arraying his troops, gloriously conquered, compensating his past forbearance by a sanguinary victory. But, however, soon afterwards, peace was concluded, because there is a change in all things; and money, which is capable of persuading what it lists, extenuates every injury. In consequence, William, the son of our king, did homage to the king of France for Normandy, holding that province, in future, by legal right from him. This was the period when the same youth was betrothed to, and married the daughter of Fulk, earl of Anjou; the father prudently aiming, by means of money in one quarter and affinity in the other, at securing his son from any disturbance.

§ 406. At this time, pope Calixtus, of whom I shall relate much hereafter,¹ approached the confines of Normandy; where the king of England, entering into conference² with him, compelled the Romans to admire and extol the ingenuity of the Normans. For he had come, as was reported, ill-disposed towards Henry, intending severely to expostulate with him, for keeping his brother, the pilgrim of the Holy Sepulchre, in confinement. But being pressed by the king's answer, which was specious, and by his plausible arguments, he had little to reply. For even common-place topics may avail much, through eloquence of speech; and, more especially that oratory cannot be despised which is seasoned with valuable presents. And that nothing might be wanting to the aggregate of glory, he provided some youths of noble family, the sons of the earl of Meulant, to dispute with the cardinals in logic. To whose inextricable sophisms, when, from the liveliness of their arguments they could make no resistance, the cardinals were not ashamed to confess that the western climes flourished with greater literary eminence than they had ever heard of or imagined, while yet in their own country. Wherefore, the issue of this conference was, that the pope declared that nothing could be more just than the king of England's cause, more conspicuous than his prudence, more copious than his eloquence.

§ 407. The father of these youths was Robert, earl of Meulant, as I observed, the son of Roger de Beaumont, who built the monastery of Preaux in Normandy, a man of primitive simplicity and sincerity, who, being frequently invited by William the First to come to England, and receive, as a recompense, whatever possessions he chose, always declined, saying that he wished to cultivate the inheritance of his forefathers, rather than covet or invade foreign possessions which did not belong to him. He had two sons, Robert, of whom we are speaking, and Henry. Henry earl of Warwick, a man of sweet and placid disposition, passed and ended his days in occupations congenial to his habits. The other, more shrewd, and of a subtler character, in addition to his paternal inheritance in Normandy and large estates in England, purchased from the king of France a castle called Meulant, which Hugh the son of Galeran, his mother's brother, had held. Conducted gradually by budding hope towards fame in the time of the former kings, he attained to its full bloom in Henry's days, and his advice was regarded as though the oracle of God had been consulted; indeed he was deservedly esteemed to have obtained it, as he was of ripe age to counsel; the persuader of peace, the dissuader of strife, and capable by his cogent eloquence of very speedily bringing about whatever he desired. He possessed such mighty influence in England, as to change by his single example the long-established modes of dress and of diet. Finally, the custom of one meal a day is observed¹ in the palaces of all the nobility through his means, which he, adopting from Alexis, emperor of Constantinople, on the score of his health, spread, as I have observed, among the rest by his example. He is blamed, as having done, and taught others to do this, more through want of liberality than any fear of surfeit or indigestion, but undeservedly; since no one, it is said, was more lavish in entertainments to others, or more moderate in himself. In law, he was the supporter of justice; in war, the insurer of victory; urging his lord the king to enforce the rigour of the statutes; himself not only following the existing, but proposing new ones; free himself from treachery towards the king, he was the avenger of it in others.²

§ 408. Besides this personage, king Henry had among his counsellors, Roger³ bishop of Salisbury, on whose advice he principally relied; for, before his accession, he had made him regulator of his household; and, on becoming king, having had proof of his abilities, first made him his chancellor, and then a bishop. The able discharge of his episcopal functions led to a hope that he might be deserving of a higher office. He therefore committed to his care the administration of the whole kingdom, whether he might be himself resident in England or absent in Normandy. The bishop would have refused to undertake so onerous an office, had not the three archbishops of Canterbury, Anselm, Ralph, and William, and, at last, the pope, enjoined him the duty of obedience. Henry was

was serving under his brother William. Passing that way, he entered in, and requested the priest to say mass. Roger began immediately, and got through his task so quickly, that the prince's attendants unanimously declared, "no man so fit for chaplain to men of their profession." And when the royal youth said, "Follow me," he adhered as closely to him, as Peter did to his heavenly Lord uttering a similar command: for Peter, leaving his vessel, followed the King of kings; he, leaving his church, followed the prince; and, appointed chaplain to himself, and his troops, became a "blind guide to the blind." See G. Neubrig. i. 6.

extremely eager to effect this, aware that Roger would faithfully perform everything for his advantage. Nor did he deceive the royal expectation; but conducted himself with so much integrity and diligence, that not a spark of envy was kindled against him. Moreover, the king was frequently detained in Normandy, sometimes for three, sometimes four years, and sometimes for a longer period; and on his return to his kingdom, he laid it to the credit of his justiciar's discretion that he found little or nothing to distress him. Amid all these affairs, he did not neglect his ecclesiastical duties, but daily diligently transacted them in the morning, that he might be more ready and undisturbed for other business. He was a prelate of a great mind, and spared no expense towards completing his designs, especially in buildings, as may be seen in many places, but more particularly at Salisbury and at Malmesbury. For there he erected extensive edifices, at vast cost, and with surpassing beauty; the courses of stone being so correctly laid, that the line of juncture escapes the eye, and leads one to imagine that the whole wall is composed of a single block. He built anew the church of Salisbury, and beautified it in such a manner that it yields to none in England, but surpasses many; so that he had just cause to say, "Lord, I have loved the glory of thy house." [Ps. xxvi. 8.]

§ 409. Murcard king of Ireland, and his successors, whose names have not reached our notice, were so devotedly attached to our Henry, that they wrote no letters, but what tended to soothe him, and did nothing but what he commanded, although it may be observed, that Murcard, from some unknown cause, acted for a short time rather superciliously towards the English; but soon after, on the suspension of navigation and of mercantile intercourse, his insolence subsided. For, of what value could Ireland be, if deprived of the merchandise of England? From poverty, or rather from the ignorance of the cultivators, the soil, unproductive of every good, engenders, without the cities, a rustic, filthy swarm of natives; but the English and French inhabit the cities in a greater degree of civilization, through their mercantile traffic. Paul earl of Orkney, though subject by hereditary right to the king of Norway, was so anxious to obtain the king's friendship, that he was perpetually sending him presents; for our king was extremely fond of the wonders of distant countries, begging with great delight, as I have observed, from foreign kings, lions, leopards, lynxes, or camels; animals which England does not produce; and he had a park called Woodstock, in which he used to foster his favourites of this kind. He had placed there also a creature called a porcupine, sent to him by William of Montpellier, of which animal Pliny the elder, in the eighth book of his Natural History, and Isidorus, on Etymologies, relate, that there is a creature in Africa, which the inhabitants call of the urchin kind, covered with prickly bristles, which it darts at will against the dogs, when pursuing it: the bristles which I have seen are more than a span long, sharp at each extremity, like the quills of a goose where the feather ceases, but rather thicker, and speckled, as it were, with black and white.

though frequently and long absent from his kingdom, on account of the commotions in Normandy, yet he so restrained the rebellious, by the terror of his name, that peace remained undisturbed in England; so that even foreigners willingly resorted thither, as to the only haven of secure tranquillity. Finally, Siward king of Norway, in his early years comparable to the bravest heroes, having entered on a voyage to Jerusalem, and asking the king's permission, wintered in England. After expending vast sums upon the churches, as soon as the western breeze opened the gates of spring to soothe the ocean, he rejoined his fleet, and proceeding to sea, terrified the Balearic isles, which are called Majorca and Minorca, by his arms, leaving them an easier conquest to the before-mentioned William of Montpellier. He thence proceeded to Jerusalem, with all his ships in safety, except one; she, while delaying to loose her cable from shore, was sucked into a tremendous whirlpool, which Paul¹ the historian of Lombardy describes as lying between the coasts of the Seine and Aquitaine, with such a force of water that its dashing may be heard at thirty miles' distance. Arriving at Jerusalem, he, for the advancement of the Christian cause, laid siege to, battered, and subdued the maritime cities of Tyre and Sidon. Changing his route, and entering Constantinople, he fixed a ship, beaked with golden dragons, as a trophy, on the church of Sancta Sophia. His men dying in numbers in this city, he discovered a remedy for the disorder, by making the survivors drink wine more sparingly, and diluted with water: and this with singular sagacity; for pouring wine on the liver of a hog, and finding that it presently was dissolved by the acidity of the liquor, he immediately conjectured that the same effect took place in men; and afterwards, on the dissection of a dead body, he had ocular proof of it. Wherefore the emperor, contemplating his sagacity and courage, which promised something great, was inclined to detain him: but he adroitly deluded the expectation in which he was already devouring the Norwegian gold; for obtaining permission to go to a neighbouring city, he deposited with him the chests of his treasures, filled with lead and sealed up, as pledges of a very speedy return; by which contrivance the emperor was deceived, and the other returned home by land.

§ 411. But that my narrative may return to Henry; he was active in providing what would be beneficial to his empire;² firm in defending it; abstinent from war, as far as he could with honour; but, when he had determined no longer to forbear, a most severe requiter of injuries, dissipating every opposing danger by the energy of his courage; constant in enmity, or in affection towards all, giving too much indulgence to the tide of anger in the one, gratifying his royal magnanimity in the other; for he depressed his enemies even to ruin, and exalted his friends and dependents to an enviable condition: for philosophy propounds this to be the first or greatest concern of a good king,

“To spare the suppliant, but depress the proud.”¹

Inflexible in the administration of justice, he ruled the people with moderation, the nobility with condescension. Seeking after robbers and counterfeiters with the greatest diligence, and punishing them when discovered; neither was he by any means negligent in matters of less importance. When he heard that the tradesmen refused broken money,² though of good silver, he commanded the whole of it to be broken or cut in pieces. The measure of his own arm was applied to correct the false ell of the traders, and he made that the standard throughout England. He made a regulation for the followers of his court, at whichever of his possessions he might be resident, stating what they should accept without payment from the country folks, and how much, and at what price, they should purchase, punishing the transgressors by a heavy pecuniary fine, or loss of life. In the beginning of his reign, that he might awe the delinquents by the terror of example, he was more inclined to punish by deprivation of limb, afterwards by fines. Thus, in consequence of the rectitude of his conduct, as is natural to man, he was feared by the nobility and beloved by the common people. If at any time the better sort, regardless of their plighted oath, wandered from the path of fidelity, he immediately recalled them to the straight road, by the wisdom of his plans, and his unceasing exertions, bringing back the refractory to reason by the wounds he inflicted on their bodies. Nor can I easily describe what perpetual labour he employed on such persons, while suffering nothing to go unpunished which the delinquents had committed repugnant to his dignity. Normandy, as I have said before, was the chief source of his wars, in which though principally resident, yet he took especial care for England; none daring to rebel, from the consideration of his courage and of his prudence. Nor indeed was he ever singled out for the attack of treachery, by reason of the rebellion of any of his nobles, through means of his attendants, except once, the author of which was a certain chamberlain, born of a plebeian father, but of distinguished consequence, as being keeper of the king's treasures; but, detected, and readily confessing his crime, he paid the severe penalty of his perfidy.³ With this exception, secure during his whole life, the minds of all were restrained by fear, their conversation by regard for him.

² Whilst endeavouring to distinguish good coin from counterfeits, the silver penny was frequently broken, and then refused. Henry's order, therefore, that all should be broken, enabled any one immediately to ascertain the quality, and at the same time left no pretext for refusing it, on account of its being broken money. See Edmer, Hist. Novor. p. 94.

§ 412. He was of middle stature, exceeding the diminutive, but exceeded by the very tall; his hair was black, and set back on the forehead; his eyes mildly bright; his chest brawny; his body fleshy. He was facetious in proper season, nor did multiplicity of business cause him to be less pleasant when he mixed in society. Not pugnacious, he verified the saying of Scipio Africanus, "My mother bore me a commander, not a soldier;" wherefore, inferior in wisdom to no king of modern time, and, as I may almost say, clearly surpassing all his predecessors in England, he preferred contending by counsel rather than by the sword: if he could, he conquered without bloodshed; if it was unavoidable, with as little as possible. Throughout his life he was wholly free from impure desires, for, as we have learnt from those who were well informed, he partook of female blandishments, not for the gratification of incontinency, but for the sake of issue; nor condescended to casual intercourse, unless where it might produce that effect: in this respect the master of his natural inclinations, not the passive slave of lust. He was plain in his diet, rather satisfying the calls of hunger, than surfeiting himself by variety of delicacies. He never drank but to allay thirst, execrating the least departure from temperance, both in himself and in those about him. His sleep was heavy, and interrupted by frequent snoring. His eloquence was rather unpremeditated than laboured; not rapid, but deliberate.

§ 413. Of laudable piety towards God, he built monasteries in England and in Normandy; but as he has not yet completed them, I, in the meantime, should suspend my judgment, did not my affection for the brotherhood at Reading forbid my silence. He built this monastery between the rivers Kennet and Thames, in a spot calculated for the reception of almost all who might have occasion to travel to the more populous cities of England, where he placed monks of the Cluniac order, who are at this day a noble pattern of holiness, and an example of unwearied and delightful hospitality. Here may be seen what is peculiar to this place; for guests arriving every hour, consume more than the inmates themselves. Perhaps some person may call me overhasty and a flatterer, for so signally celebrating a congregation yet in its infancy, unconscious what future times may produce; but they, (as I hope,) will endeavour, by the grace of God, to continue in virtue; I blush not at commending men of holiness, and admiring that excellence in others which I possess not myself. He yielded up the investiture¹ of the churches to God and St. Peter, after much controversy the king, was, on his detection, mercifully adjudged to lose only his eyes and his manhood, when he justly deserved hanging. Vit. Lud. Grossi, ap. Duchesne, iv. 308.

between him and archbishop Anselm, scarcely induced, even at last, to consent, through the manifold grace of God, by an inglorious victory over his brother. The tenor of these disputes Edmer has recorded at great length; I, to give a completer knowledge of the matter, shall subjoin the letters of the so-often-mentioned pope Paschal on the subject.

§ 414. “ Paschal the bishop to king Henry, greeting. From your letters lately transmitted to us by your servant, our beloved son, William the clerk, we have been certified both of the safety of your person, and of those prosperous successes which the divine favour hath granted you in the subjugation of the adversaries of your kingdom. We have heard, too, that you have had the male issue you so much desired by your noble and religious consort. As we have derived pleasure from this, we think it a good opportunity to impress the commands and will of God more strongly upon you, at a time when you perceive yourself indebted to his kindness for such ample favours. We also are desirous of associating our kindness with the benefits of God towards you; but it is distressing that you should seem to require what we cannot possibly grant. For if we consent, or suffer, that investitures be conferred by your excellence, no doubt it will be to the great detriment both of ourselves and of you. In this matter we wish you to consider, what you lose by not performing, or gain by performing: for we, by such a prohibition, obtain no increase of influence, or patronage, over the churches; nor do we endeavour to take away anything from your just power and right; but only that God's anger may be diminished towards you, and thus every prosperity attend you. God, indeed, hath said, ‘Those that honour me, I will honour; and those that despise me shall be lightly esteemed.’ [1 Sam. ii. 30.] You will say then, ‘It is my right.’ No, truly, it is neither an imperial nor royal, but a divine right; it is his only, who has said, ‘I am the door.’ Wherefore, I entreat for his sake, whose due it is, that you would restore and concede it to Him, to whose goodness you owe what you possess. But why should we oppose your pleasure, or run counter to your good-will, unless we were aware that in consenting to this matter we should oppose the will of God and lose his favour? Why should we deny you anything which might be granted to any man living, when we should receive greater favours from you in return? Consider, my dearest son, whether it be an honour or a disgrace that Anselm, the wisest, and most religious of the Gallican bishops, on this account, fears to dwell with you or to continue in your kingdom. What will those persons think who have hitherto had such favourable accounts of you? What will they say when this gets noised abroad? The very people who, before your face, commend your excess, will, when out of your presence, be the first more loudly to denounce the transaction. Return then to your understanding, my dearest son, we entreat you, for the mercy of God and the love of his Only-begotten Son : recal your pastor, recal your father ; and supposing, what we do not imagine, he hath in anything conducted himself harshly towards you, if you will give up the investitures, we will mediate according to your pleasure, as far as God permits ; but nevertheless, remove from your person and your kingdom the infamy of such an expulsion. If you do this, even although you should ask very difficult matters of us ; still if, with God's permission, we can grant them, you shall certainly obtain them ; and we will be careful to entreat the Lord for you, Himself assisting, and will grant indulgence and absolution, as well to your sins as to those of your consort, through the merits of the holy apostles. Moreover, we will, together with you, cherish the son whom you have begotten on your exemplary and noble consort ; and who is, as we have heard, named after your excellent father, William, with such anxious care, that whosoever shall injure either you or him, shall be regarded as having done injury to the church of Rome. Given at the palace of Lateran, the ninth of the kalends of December." [Nov. 23, 1103.]

Henry with Paschal enacted, that in future the king would not confer bishoprics by the staff and ring; but that the bishops should perform the ceremony of homage, in token of submission for their temporals; the election by this means, remaining, nominally, in the chapter, or monastery.

§ 415. "Paschal to Anselm. We have received those most gratifying letters of your affection, written with the pen of charity. In these we recognise the fervency of your devotion ; and, considering the strength of your faith, and the earnestness of your pious care, we rejoice ; because, by the grace of God, promises neither elevate, nor threats depress you. We lament, however, that after having kindly received our brothers the bishops, ambassadors of the king of England, they should, on their return home, report what we never uttered, or even thought of. For we have heard, that they said, if the king conducted himself well in other respects, we should neither prohibit the investiture of the churches, nor anathematize them when conferred ; but that we were unwilling thus to write, lest from this precedent other princes should make demands upon us. Wherefore we call Jesus, who trieth the hearts and reins, as witness to our soul, if ever such an horrid crime even entered our imagination, since we assumed the care of this holy see." And again further on. "If, therefore, a lay hand present the staff, the sign of the shepherd's office, or the ring, the emblem of faith, what have the bishops to do in the church ? Moreover, those bishops who have changed the truth into a lie, that truth, which is God, being the criterion, we separate from the favour of St. Peter and our society, until they have made satisfaction to the church of Rome. Such, therefore, as have received investiture,¹ or consecration during the aforesaid truce,² we regard as aliens to our communion and to the church." [Dec. 12, 1102.]

² On Anselm's return, shortly after Henry's accession, it was agreed that all matters should remain in abeyance, until both parties should have sent messengers to the pope, for his decision on the subject of investitures. See Edmer, p. 56.

obedience to the papal see, we give thanks to the same God of mercies, in whose hand are the hearts of kings. We believe it indeed to have been effected through favour to your charity, and the earnestness of your prayers, that, in this respect, the heavenly mercy hath regarded the people over whom your watchfulness presides. But whereas we so greatly condescend to the king, and those who seem culpable, you must know, that this has been done from kindness and compassion, that we may lift up those that are down. And you, also, reverend and dearest brother in Christ, we release from the prohibition, or as you conceive, excommunication, which, you understand, was denounced against investitures or homage, by our predecessor of holy memory, pope Urban. But do you, by the assistance of God, accept those persons who either have received investitures, or consecrated such as have received them, or have done homage, on making that satisfaction, which we signify to you by our common legates William and Baldwin, faithful and true men, and absolve them by virtue of our authority. These, either consecrate yourself, or command them to be consecrated by such as you choose; unless, perchance, you should discover somewhat in them, on account of which they ought to be deprived of their sacred honours. And if any, hereafter, in addition to the investitures of the churches, shall have accepted prelacies, even though they have done homage to the king, yet let them not, on this account, be denied the office of consecration, until by the grace of Almighty God the heart of the king may be softened, by the dew of your preaching, to omit this. Moreover, against the bishops, who have brought, as you know, a false report of us, our heart is more vehemently moved, because they have not only injured us, but have led astray the minds of many simple people, and impelled the king to set himself in opposition to the benevolence of the papal see: wherefore, by the help of God, we suffer not their crime to pass unpunished; but since the earnestness of our son the king unceasingly intreats for them, you will not deny, even to them, the participation of your communion. Indeed, you will, according to our promise, absolve from their transgressions and from penance the king and his consort, and those nobles, who for this business, together with the king, have by our command been under sentence, whose names you will learn from the information of the aforesaid William. We commit the cause of the bishop of Rouen to your consideration, and we grant to him whatsoever you may allow." [March 23, 1106.]

§ 417. In this manner acted Paschal the supreme pope, anxious for the liberty of the churches of God. The bishops, whom he accuses of falsehood, were Girard, archbishop of York, and Herbert of Norwich; whose errors were discovered by the more veracious legates, William, afterwards bishop of Exeter, and Baldwin, monk of Bec. Anselm¹ the archbishop, was now again, in the time of this king, an exile at Lyons, resident with Hugh, archbishop of that city, when the first letter which I have inserted was despatched; for he himself possessed no desire to return, nor did the king, through the multitude of sycophants, suffer his animosity to be appeased. He deferred, therefore, for a long time, recalling him, or complying with the papal admonition; not from desire of power, but through the advice of the nobility; and particularly of the earl of Meulant, who, in this affair, erroneously regarding ancient custom more than a sense of right, alleged that the king's majesty would be much diminished, if, disregarding the usage of his predecessors, he ceased to invest the elected person with the staff and ring. The king, however, considering more attentively what the clear reasoning of the epistles, and the bountiful gift of divine favours plentifully showered down upon him admonished, yielded up the investiture of the ring and staff for ever: retaining only the prerogatives of election and of the first-fruits. A great council, therefore, of bishops, nobles, and abbots, being assembled at London, many points of ecclesiastical and secular business were settled: many differences adjusted. And not long after, five bishops were ordained in Kent on the same day, by archbishop Anselm: William to the see of Winchester: Roger to Salisbury: William to Exeter: Reinald to Hereford: Urban to Glamorgan. In this manner a controversy, agitated by perpetual dissensions, and the cause of many a journey to and from Rome by Anselm, met with a commendable termination.

§ 418. Henry's queen, Matilda, descended from an ancient and illustrious race of kings, daughter of the king of Scotland, as I have said¹ before, had also given her attention to literature, being educated from her infancy among the nuns at Wilton and Romsey. Wherefore, in order to have a colour for refusing an ignoble alliance, which was more than once offered by her father, she wore the garb indicative of the holy profession. This, when the king was about to advance her to his bed, became matter of controversy; nor could the archbishop be induced to consent to her marriage, but by the production of lawful witnesses, who swore that she had worn the veil on account of her suitors, but had never made her vow. Satisfied with a child of either sex, she ceased having issue, and enduring with complacency, when the king was elsewhere employed, the absence of the court, she continued many years at Westminster: yet was no part of royal magnificence wanting to her; but at all times crowds of visitants and news-bearers were, in endless multitudes, entering and departing from her superb dwelling: for this the king's liberality commanded; this her own kindness and affability attracted. She was singularly holy; by no means despicable in point of beauty; a rival of her mother's piety; never committing any impropriety, as far as herself was concerned; and, with the exception of the king's bed, completely chaste and uncontaminated even by suspicion. Clad in hair cloth beneath her royal habit, she was accustomed, in Lent, to visit the churches barefoot: nor was she disgusted at washing the feet of the diseased; handling their ulcers dripping with corruption, and, finally, pressing their hands for a long time together to her lips, and decking their table.

She had a singular pleasure in hearing the service of God ; and on this account was thoughtlessly prodigal towards clerks of melodious voice ; addressed them kindly, gave to them liberally, and promised still more abundantly. Her generosity becoming universally known, crowds of scholars, equally famed for verse and for singing, came over ; and happy did he account himself, who could attract the queen's notice by the novelty of his song. Nor on these only did she lavish money, but on all sorts of men, especially foreigners ; that through her presents they might proclaim her celebrity abroad : for the desire of fame is so rooted in the human mind, that scarcely is any one contented with the precious fruits of a good conscience, but is fondly anxious, if he does anything laudable, to have it generally known. Hence, it was justly observed, the disposition crept upon the queen to reward all the foreigners she could, while the others were kept in suspense, sometimes with effectual, but oftener with empty promises. Hence, too, it arose, that she fell into the error of prodigal givers ; bringing many claims on her tenantry, exposing them to injuries, and taking away their property ; but, obtaining the credit of a liberal benefactress, she little regarded the sarcasms of her own people. But a correct judgment will impute this to the designs of her servants ; who, harpy-like, conveyed everything they could gripe into their purses, or wasted it in riotous living : her ears being infected with the base insinuations of these people, she induced this stain on her noble mind ; holy and meritorious in every other respect. Amid these concerns, she was snatched away from her country, to the great loss of the people, but to her own advantage [May 1, 1118] : for her funeral being splendidly celebrated at Westminster, she entered into rest ; and her spirit manifested, by no trivial indications, that she was a resident in heaven. She died, willingly leaving the throne, after a reign of seventeen years and six months ; experiencing the fate of her family, who almost all departed in the flower of their age. To her bed, but not immediately, succeeded [A. D. 1121] Adala, daughter of the duke of Louvaine, which is the principal town of Lorrain.

§ 419. By Matilda king Henry had a son named William, educated and destined to the succession, with the fondest hope and surpassing care. For to him, when scarcely twelve years of age, all the free men of England and Normandy, of every rank and condition, and under fealty to whatever lord, were obliged to submit themselves by homage and by oath. When a boy, too, he was betrothed to, and received in wedlock, the daughter of Fulk earl of Anjou, who was herself scarcely marriageable [A. D. 1119] ; his father-in-law bestowing on him the county of Maine as her dower : moreover, Fulk, proceeding to Jerusalem, committed his earldom to the king, to be restored, should he return, but otherwise, to go to his son-in-law. Many provinces, then, looked forward to the government of this boy : for it was supposed that the prediction of king Edward would be verified in him ; and it was said, that now might it be expected, that the hopes of England, like the tree¹ cut down, would, through this youth, again blossom and bring forth fruit, and thus put an end to her sufferings : but God saw otherwise ; for this illusion vanished into air, as an early day was hastening him to his fate. Indeed, by the exertions of his father-in-law, and of Thibaut the son of Stephen, and of his aunt Adala, Louis king of France conceded the legal possession of Normandy to the lad, on his doing him homage. The prudence of his truly careful father so arranged and contrived, that the homage which he, from the extent of his empire, disdained to perform, should not be refused by his son, a youth of delicate habit, and not very likely to live. In discussing and peaceably settling these matters, the king spent the space of four years ; continuing the whole of that time in Normandy. Nevertheless, the calm of this brilliant and carefully concerted peace, this anxious, universal hope, was destroyed in an instant by the vicissitudes of human estate. For, giving orders for returning to England, the king set sail from Barfleur just before twilight on the seventh of the kalends of December [Nov. 25, 1120] ; and the breeze which filled his sails conducted him safely to his kingdom and extensive fortunes. But the young man, who was now somewhat more than seventeen years of age, and, by his father's indulgence, possessed everything but the name of king, commanded another vessel to be prepared for himself ; almost all the young nobility flocking around him, from similarity of youthful pursuits. The sailors, too, immoderately filled with wine, with that seaman's hilarity which their cups excited, exclaimed, that those who were now ahead, must soon be left astern ; for the ship was of the best construction, and recently fitted with new materials. When, therefore, it was now dark night, these imprudent youths, overwhelmed with liquor, launched the vessel from the shore. She flew swifter than the winged arrow, sweeping the rippling surface of the deep : but the carelessness of the intoxicated crew drove her on a rock, which rose above the waves not far from shore. In the greatest consternation, they immediately ran on deck, and with loud outcry got ready their boathooks, endeavouring for a considerable time to force the vessel off : but fate was against them, and frustrated every exertion. The oars, too, dashing, horribly crashed against the rock,¹ and her battered prow hung immovably fixed. Now, too, the water washed some of the crew overboard, and, entering the chinks, drowned others ; when the boat having been launched, the young prince was received into it, and might certainly have been saved by reaching the shore, had not his illegitimate sister, the countess of Perche, now struggling with death in the larger vessel, implored her brother's assistance ; shrieking out, that he should not abandon her so barbarously. Touched with pity, he ordered the boat to return to the ship, that he might rescue his sister ; and thus the unhappy youth met his death through excess of affection : for the skiff, overcharged by the multitudes who leaped into her, sunk, and buried all indiscriminately in the deep. One rustic² alone escaped ; who, floating all night upon the mast, related in the morning the dismal catastrophe. No ship was ever productive of so much misery to England; none ever so widely celebrated throughout the world. Here also perished with William, Richard, another of the king's sons, whom a woman of no rank had borne him, before his accession; a brave youth, and dear to his father from his obedience: Richard earl of Chester, and his brother Otuell, the tutor and preceptor of the king's son: the countess of Perche, the king's daughter, and his niece the countess of Chester, sister to Thibaut: and indeed almost every person of consequence about court, whether knight, or chaplain, or young nobleman, training up to arms. For, as I have said, they eagerly hastened from all quarters, expecting no small addition to their reputation, if they could either amuse, or show their devotion to the young prince. The calamity was augmented by the difficulty of finding the bodies, which could not be discovered by the various persons who sought them along the shore; but delicate as they were, they became food for the monsters of the deep. The death of this youth being known, produced a wonderful change in existing circumstances. His father renounced the celibacy he had cherished since Matilda's death, anxious for future heirs by a new consort: his father-in-law, returning home from Jerusalem, faithfully espoused the party of William, the son of Robert earl of Normandy; giving him his other daughter in marriage, and the county of Maine; his indignation being excited against the king, by his daughter's dowry being detained in England after the death of the prince.

§ 420. His daughter Matilda, by Matilda, king Henry gave in marriage to Henry emperor of Germany, son of that Henry mentioned in the third book. Henry was the fifth emperor of the Germans of this name; who, although he had been extremely incensed at his father for his outrages against the holy see, yet, in his own time, was the rigid follower of, and stickler for, the same sentiments. For when Paschal, a man possessed of every virtue, had succeeded pope Urban, the question again arose concerning the investiture of the churches, together with all the former contentions and animosities; as neither party would give way. The emperor had in his favour all the bishops and abbots of his kingdoms situate on this side the mountains; because Charles the Great, to keep in check the ferocity of those nations, had conferred almost all the country on the churches: most wisely considering, that the clergy would not so soon cast off their fidelity to their lord, as the laity; and, besides, if the laity were to rebel, they might be restrained by the authority of their excommunication, and the weight of their power. The pope had brought over to his side the churches beyond the mountains, and the cities of Italy scarcely acknowledged the dominion of Henry; thinking themselves exonerated from servitude after the death of his brother Conrad, who, being left by his father as king of Lombardy, had died at Arezzo. But Henry, rivalling the ancient Cæsar in every noble quality, after tranquillizing his German empire, extended his thoughts to his Italian kingdom; purposing to quell the revolt of the cities, and decide the question of investitures according to his own pleasure.

This progress to Rome, accomplished by great exertion of mind, and much painful labour of body, hath been described by David bishop of Bangor, a Scot; though far more partially to the king than becomes an historian. Indeed he commends highly even his unheard-of violence in taking the pope captive, though he held him in free custody; citing the example of Jacob's holding the angel fast till he extorted a blessing. Moreover, he labours to establish, that the saying of the apostle, "No servant of God embroils himself in worldly business" [2 Tim. ii. 4], is not repugnant to the desires of those bishops who are invested by the laity, because the doing homage to a layman, by a clergyman, is not a secular business. How frivolous such arguments are, any person's consideration may decide. In the meantime, that I may not seem to bear hard on a good man by my judgment, I determine to make allowances for him, since he has not written an history, but a panegyric. I will now therefore faithfully insert the grant¹ and agreement extorted from the pope, by a forcible detention of three weeks; and I shall subjoin, in what manner they were soon after made of none effect, by an holier council.

§ 421. "The sovereign pope Paschal will not molest the sovereign king, nor his empire nor kingdom, on account of the investiture of bishoprics and abbeys, nor concerning the injury suffered by himself and his party in person and in goods; nor will he return evil to him, or any other person, on this account; neither, on any consideration, will he publish an anathema against the person of king Henry: nor will the sovereign pope delay to crown him, according to the ritual; and he will assist him, as far as possible, by the aid of his office, to retain his kingdom and empire. And this the sovereign pope will fulfil without fraud or evil design." These are the names of the bishops and cardinals, who, at the command of the sovereign pope Paschal, confirmed by oath the grant to and friendship with the sovereign emperor Henry: Peter, bishop of Portus: Centius, bishop of Sabina: Robert, cardinal of St. Eusebius: Boniface, cardinal of St. Mark: Anastasius, cardinal of St. Clement: Gregory, cardinal of the apostles Peter and Paul: also Gregory, cardinal of St. Chrysogonus: John, cardinal of St. Potentiana: Risus, cardinal of St. Lawrence: Reinerus, cardinal of Saints Marcellinus and Peter: Vitalis, cardinal of St. Balbina: Teuzo, cardinal of St. Mark: Theobald, cardinal of John and Paul: John, dean in the Greek School:² Leo, dean of St. Vitalis: Albo, dean of Sergius and Bachus.

§ 422. The king also made oath as follows. "I Henry the king will, on the fourth or fifth day of the ensuing week, set at liberty the sovereign pope, and the bishops and cardinals, and all the captives and hostages, who were taken for him, or with him; and I will cause them to be conducted safely within the gates of the city beyond the Tiber;³ nor will I hereafter seize, or suffer to be seized, such as remain under fealty to the lord pope Paschal : and with the Roman people, and the city beyond the Tiber, I will, as well by myself as by my people, preserve peace and security to such persons as shall keep peace with me. I will faithfully assist the sovereign pope, in retaining his papacy, quietly and securely. I will restore the patrimony and possessions of the Roman church which I have taken away ; and I will aid him in recovering and keeping everything which he ought to have, after the manner of his predecessors, with true faith, and without fraud or evil design : and I will obey the sovereign pope, saving the honour of my kingdom and empire, as Catholic emperors ought to obey Catholic Roman pontiffs." And they who swore on the part of the king are these ; Frederic, archbishop of Cologne : Godebard, bishop of Trent : Bruno, bishop of Spire : count Berengar : Albert the chancellor : count Herman : Frederic, count palatine : the marquis Boniface : Albert, count of Blandriac : count Frederic : count Godfrid : and the marquis Warner.

§ 423. This treaty being settled, and confirmed by the oath of the aforesaid bishops and cardinals, and mutual embraces exchanged, the sovereign pope, on the fourth of the ides of April [April 13, 1111], being Quasimodo Sunday, celebrated mass ; in which, after his own communion and that of the ministers at the altar, he gave the Body and Blood of our Lord to the emperor with these words : "This Body of the Lord, which the truly holy church retains, born of the Virgin Mary, exalted on the cross for the redemption of mankind, we give to thee, dearest son, for the remission of thy sins, and for the preservation of the peace and true friendship to be confirmed between me and thee, the empire and the priesthood." Again, on the next day, the pope and the king met at the columns¹ which are in the Forum, guards being stationed wherever it was deemed necessary, that the consecration of the king might not be impeded. And at the Silver² gate he was received by the bishops and cardinals, and all the Roman clergy ; and the prayer being begun, as contained in the ritual, by the bishop of Ostia, (as the bishop of Albano, by whom it ought to have been said had he been present, was absent,) he was conducted to the middle of the Rota,³ and there received the second prayer from the bishop of Portus, as the Roman ritual enjoins. After this they led him, with litanies, to the confessionary of the Apostles,⁴ and there the bishop of Ostia anointed him between the shoulders, and on the right arm. This being done, he was conducted by the sovereign pontiff to the altar of the aforesaid apostles, and there the crown being placed on his head by the pope himself, he was consecrated emperor. After putting on the crown, the mass of the Resurrection of the Lord was celebrated, during which, before the communion, the sovereign pope, with his own hand, gave to the emperor the grant in which he conceded to

§ 424. “ Paschal the bishop, servant of the servants of God, sendeth greeting and his apostolical benediction, to his dearest son in Christ, Henry, by the grace of Almighty God, august emperor of the Romans. The Divine disposal hath ordained, that your kingdom shall unite with the holy Roman church, since your predecessors, through valour and surpassing prudence, have obtained the crown and sovereignty of the Roman city ; to the dignity of which crown and empire, the Divine majesty, by the ministry of our priesthood, hath advanced your person, my dearest son Henry. That pre-eminence of dignity, then, which our predecessors have granted to yours, the Catholic emperors, and have confirmed in the volume of grants, we also concede to your affection, and in the scroll of this present grant confirm also, that you may confer the investiture of the staff and ring on the bishops or abbots of your kingdom freely elected without violence or simony: but, after their investiture, let them receive canonical consecration from the bishop to whom it pertains. But if any person shall be elected, either by the clergy or the people, against your consent, unless he be invested by you, let him be consecrated by no one ; excepting such, indeed, as are accustomed to be at the disposal of the archbishops, or of the Roman pontiff. Moreover, let the archbishops or bishops have permission canonically to consecrate bishops or abbots invested by you. Your predecessors, indeed, so largely endowed the churches of their kingdom with their royalties, that it is fitting that kingdom should be especially strengthened by the power of bishops or abbots ; and that popular dissensions, which often happen in all elections, should be checked by royal majesty. Wherefore, your prudence and authority ought to take more especial care, to preserve the grandeur of the Roman church, and the safety of the rest, through God’s assistance, by your gifts and services. Therefore, if any ecclesiastical or secular person, knowing this document of our concession, shall rashly dare oppose it, let him be anathematized, unless he recant, and let him run the risk of losing his honour and dignity: but may God’s mercy preserve such as keep it, and may He grant your person and authority to reign happily to his honour and glory.” [April 12, 1111.]

§ 425. The whole ceremony of the consecration being completed, the pope and the emperor, joining their right hands, went with much state to the chamber which fronts the confessional of St. Gregory, that the pope might there put off his pontifical, and the emperor his regal vestments. As the emperor retired from the chamber divested of his royal insignia, the Roman patricians met him with a golden circle, which they placed upon his head, and by it gave him the supreme Patriciate¹ of the Roman city, with common consent and universal approbation.

literally from the narrative of the aforesaid David, written, as I have said, with too great partiality towards the king. In the following year, however, a council was assembled at Rome, rather by the connivance than the command of the pope, and the grant was nullified. The authors of its reversal were the archbishop of Vienne, who was afterwards pope, and Girard, bishop of Angoulesme, who stimulated their brother bishops to make these concessions of none effect. The proceedings of that council were as follows:—

§ 427. In the year of our Lord's incarnation one thousand one hundred and twelve, the fifth of the indiction, in the thirteenth year of the pontificate of our Lord the pope Paschal the second, in the month of March, on the fifteenth of the kalends of April [18 March], a council was held at Rome, at the Lateran, in the church of Constantine;¹ where, when pope Paschal, together with the archbishops, bishops, and cardinals, and a mixed company of clergy and laity, had, on the last day of the council, taken his seat, making public profession of the Catholic faith, lest any one should doubt his orthodoxy, he said, "I embrace all the Holy Scripture of the Old and New Testament, the law written by Moses and by the holy prophets; I embrace the four Gospels, the seven canonical Epistles, the Epistles of the glorious preacher St. Paul the apostle, the holy Canons of the apostles, the four Universal councils, to wit, the Nicene, Ephesian, Constantinopolitan, Chalcedonian, in the same manner as I do the four Gospels; moreover the council of Antioch and the decrees of the holy fathers, the Roman pontiffs; and, more especially, the decrees of my lords pope Gregory the seventh, and pope Urban of blessed memory. What they have approved, I approve; what they held, I hold; what they have confirmed, I confirm; what they have condemned, I condemn; what they have opposed, I oppose; what they have interdicted, I interdict; what they have prohibited, I prohibit: I will persevere in the same in everything and through everything." This being ended, Girard, bishop of Angoulesme, legate in Aquitaine, rose up for all, and by the unanimous consent of pope Paschal and of all the council, read the following writing:—

§ 428. "That grant which is no grant, but ought more properly to be called an abomination,² for the liberation of captives and of the church, extorted from the sovereign pope Paschal by the violence of king Henry, all of us in this holy council assembled, with the sovereign pope, condemn by canonical censure and ecclesiastical authority, by the judgment of the Holy Spirit; and we adjudge it to be void and altogether nullify it; and that it may have neither force nor efficacy we interdict it altogether. And it is condemned on this account, because in that abomination it is asserted, that a person canonically elected by the clergy and the people, shall not be consecrated by any one, unless first invested by the king, which is contrary to the Holy Spirit and to canonical institution."

This writing being read, the whole council, and all present, unanimously cried out, "Amen, Amen : So be it, So be it."

§ 429. The archbishops there present with their suffragans were these : John, patriarch of Venice ; Semies of Capua ; Landulf of Benevento ; those of Amalfi, Reggio, Otranto, Brindisi, Capsa, Gerenza ; and the Greeks, Rosanus, and the archbishop of St. Severina. The bishops were : Censius of Sabina ; Peter of Portus ; Leo of Ostia ; Cono of Preneste ; Girard of Angoulesme ; Galo of Leon, legate for Berri ; and the archbishop of Vienne, Roger of Volterra ; Geoffrey of Sienna ; Roland of Populonia ; Gregory of Terracina ; William of Troy ; William of Syracuse, legate for all the Sicilians, and near an hundred other bishops. Siwin, and John bishop of Tusculum, though at Rome, were not present on that day of the council ; but they, afterwards, on the reading of the condemnation of the grant, assented to, and approved of it.

§ 430. These things gaining publicity, all France made no scruple of considering the emperor as accursed by the power of ecclesiastical zeal hurled against him. Roused at this, in the seventeenth year of pope Paschal, he proceeded to Rome to inflict signal vengeance on him. But he, by a blessed departure,¹ had avoided all earthly molestation, and from his place of repose on high, laughed at the threats of the angry emperor, who, having heard of his death, quickened his journey, in order that, ejecting John of Gaeta, chancellor to the late pope, who had been already elected and called Gelasius, he might intrude Maurice, bishop of Braga, surnamed Burdin, on the see ; but the following epistle of Gelasius will explain the business more fully :—

"Gelasius, servant of the servants of God, to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, clergy, princes, and other faithful people throughout Gaul, sends greeting. As you are members of the church of Rome, we are anxious to signify to your affection what has there lately taken place. Shortly after our election, then, the sovereign emperor coming by stealth and with unexpected haste to Rome, compelled us to depart from the city. He afterwards demanded peace by threats and intimidation, saying he would do all he might be able, unless we assured him of peace by oath. To which we replied thus : 'Concerning the controversy which exists between the church and the empire, we willingly agree to a meeting or to legal discussion, at proper time and place, that is to say, either at Milan or Cremona, on the next feast of St. Luke, at the discretion of our brethren, who, by God, are constituted judges in the church, and without whom this matter cannot be treated of. And since the sovereign emperor demands security from us, we promise such to him, by word and by writing, unless in the interim he himself shall violate it ; for otherwise to give security is dishonourable to the church and contrary to custom.' He, immediately, on the forty-fourth day after our election, intruded into the mother church the bishop of Braga, who, the preceding year, had been excommunicated by our predecessor pope Paschal, in a council at Benevento, and who had also, when he formerly received the pall from our hands, sworn fidelity to the same pontiff and his catholic successors, of whom I am the first. In this prodigious crime, however, thanks be to God, the sovereign emperor had no single Roman associate, only the Guibertines, Romanus of St. Marcellus, Centius, who was called of St. Chrysogon; Teuzo, who for a long time was guilty of many excesses in Dacia; these alone transacted so shameless a deed. We command your wisdom, therefore, on the receipt of these presents, that, deliberating on these matters in common, by the grace of God, you be prepared, by his help, to avenge the mother church, as you are aware ought to be done by your joint assistance. Given at Gaeta on the seventeenth of the kalends of February [16th Jan. A. D. 1119].”

§ 431. Gelasius, after his expulsion, embarking at Salerno, came thence to Genoa, and afterwards proceeded by land to Clugny, where he died. Then, that is, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and nineteen, the cardinals who had accompanied him, together with the whole Cisalpine church, having regard to the piety and energy of Guido, archbishop of Vienne, elevated him with great pomp to the papacy, and called him Calixtus, hoping, that through his power, as he possessed great influence, they might be able to withstand the force of the emperor. Nor did he deceive their confidence; for soon after, calling a council at Rheims, he separated from the churches such as had been, or should be, invested by the laity, including the emperor also, unless he should recant. Thus continuing for some time in the hither districts, to strengthen his party, and having settled all affairs in Gaul, he came to Rome, and was gladly received by the citizens, as the emperor had now departed. Burdin then, deserted, fled to Sutri, determining to nurture his power by many a pilgrim's loss; but how he was ejected thence the following epistle explains:—

§ 432. “Calixtus, the bishop, servant of the servants of God, to his beloved brethren and sons, the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, and other faithful servants of St. Peter, clergy as well as laity, situated throughout Gaul, sends greeting and apostolical benediction. As the people have forsaken the law of the Lord, and walk not in His judgments, God visits their iniquities with a rod, and their sins with stripes; but retaining the bowels of paternal love, He does not desert such as trust in His mercy. For a long time, indeed, their sins so requiring, the faithful of the church have been disturbed by Burdin, that puppet of the king of Germany; nay, some have been taken captive, others starved to death in prison. Lately, however, after celebrating the festival of Easter, when we could no longer endure the complaints of the pilgrims, and of the poor, we left the city with the faithful servants of the church, and laid siege to Sutri, until the Divine power delivered that Burdin aforesaid, the enemy of the church, (who had there made a nest for the devil,) as well as the place itself, entirely into our power. We beg your brotherly love therefore, to return thanks with us to the King of kings, for such great benefits, and to remain most firmly in obedience and duty to the catholic church, as you will receive from God Almighty, through his grace, due recompence for it, both here and hereafter. We beg, too, that these letters be made public with all due diligence. Given at Sutri on the fifth of the kalends of May.”

§ 433. How exquisite and refined a piece of wit, to call the man he hated the puppet of the king of Germany! for the emperor certainly held in high estimation Maurice's skill in literature and politics. He was, as I have said, archbishop of Braga, a city of Spain; a man whom any one might highly reverence, and almost venerate, for his active and unwearied assiduity, had he not been led to make himself conspicuous by so disgraceful an act; nor would he have hesitated to purchase the holy see, if he could have found a purchaser so desperate as to buy what he was ready to sell. But being taken and made a monk, he was sent to the monastery called “The Den.”¹

§ 434. The laudable magnanimity of the pope proceeded still farther in the promotion of justice, to the end that he might repress the boundless and innate cupidity of the Romans. In his time there were no snares laid for the traveller in the neighbourhood of Rome, no assaults on him when he arrived within the city. The offerings to St. Peter, (which, through insolence, and for their lusts, the powerful used to pillage, basely injuring such preceding popes as dared even complain,) Calixtus brought back to their proper use, that is to say, for the public service of the ruler of the holy see. Neither could the desire of amassing money, nor the love of it when collected, produce in his breast anything repugnant to justice; so that he admonished the English pilgrims, on account of the length of the journey, rather to go to St. David's² than to Rome, allowing the benefit of the same benediction to such as went twice to that place, as resulted to those who went once to Rome. Moreover that inveterate controversy between the empire and the priesthood, concerning investiture, which for more than fifty years had created commotions, to such a degree, that, when any favourer of this heresy was cut off by disease or death, immediately, like the hydra's heads, many sprouted up afresh; this man by his diligence cut off, brought low, and rooted out, decapitating German fierceness with the vigorous stroke of the papal hatchet. This, the declaration of the emperor, and of the pope, will show to the world in the following words:—

§ 435. “I, Calixtus, bishop, servant of the servants of God, do grant unto you, my beloved son, Henry, by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, that the election of bishops and abbots of the German empire, who pertain to the regality, shall take place in your presence without simony or any violence; so that if any discord shall arise between the parties, you may give your assent or aid to the worthier side, by the counsel or judgment of the metropolitan or suffragans. But the elect shall receive the royalties from you, and do whatever, by these, he is lawfully bound to perform to you ; but any one consecrated in the other parts of the empire, shall, within six months, receive his royalties from you, by your sceptre, and do whatever, by these, he is lawfully bound to perform to you ; all things excepted which are known to belong to the Roman church. Moreover in those matters whereof you have complained and demanded my assistance, I will afford you aid according to the duty of my office. I grant firm peace to you, and to all who are, or were, aiding you at the time of this dispute. Farewell."

§ 436. "In the name of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, I, Henry Augustus, by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, for the love of God, and of the holy Roman church, and of the sovereign pope Calixtus ; and for the release of my soul, do give up unto God, and to God's holy apostles Peter and Paul, and to the holy catholic church, all investitures by the ring and staff, and do allow canonical election and free consecration to take place in all churches of my kingdom or empire. The possessions and prerogatives of St. Peter, which, from the beginning of this dispute to the present day, have been taken away, either in my father's or my own time, and which I now hold, I restore to the same holy Roman church ; and such as I do not possess, I will faithfully assist her in recovering. And of the possessions of all other churches, princes, and others, clergy as well as lay, which have been forfeited in this contention by the advice of my princes, or by course of law, such as I have I will restore, and such as I do not possess I will faithfully assist in recovering. And I grant firm peace to the sovereign pope Calixtus, and to the holy Roman church, and to all who are, or have been, on her side ; and I will faithfully assist the holy Roman church in everything in which she requires assistance ; and will afford her due justice in such matters whereof she shall have complained." All these affairs were transacted by the consent and counsel of the nobility, whose names are subscribed : Albert, archbishop of Mentz ; Frederic, archbishop of Cologne ; the bishop of Ratisbon ; the bishop of Bamberg ; Bruno, bishop of Spire ; the bishop of Augsburg ; the bishop of Utrecht ; the bishop of Constance ; the abbot of Fulda ; duke Herman ; duke Frederic ; Boniface the marquis ; Thibaut the marquis ; Ernulf count palatine ; Otbert count palatine ; and count Berengar.

§ 437. The long-standing malady which had disturbed the church being thus cured, every true Christian greatly rejoiced, that this emperor, who, in military glory, trod fast upon the footsteps of Charles the Great, neither degenerated from his devotion to God : for, in addition to nobly quelling the rebellions of his German empire, he subdued his Italian dominions in such wise as none had done before. Entering Italy thrice, within the space of ten years, he restrained the pride of the cities : at his first coming he exterminated by fire, Novara, Placentia, and Arezzo : at the second and third, Cremona and Mantua : and quieted the sedition at Ravenna, by a siege of a few days' continuance ; for the Pisans and Pavians, with the people of Milan, embraced his friendship, rather than encounter his enmity. The daughter of the king of England, who, as I said before,¹ was married to him, resembled her father in fortitude, and her mother in sanctity: piety and assiduity vied with each other in her character, nor was it easy to discern which of her good qualities was most commendable.

§ 438. At that time lived William earl of Poitiers; a giddy unsettled kind of man; who after² he returned from Jerusalem, as the preceding book³ relates, wallowed as completely in the sty of vice, as though he had believed that all things were governed by chance, and not by Providence. Moreover, he rendered his absurdities pleasant by a show of wit; exciting the loud laughter of his hearers. Finally, erecting, near a castle called Niort, certain buildings after the form of a little monastery, he used to talk idly about placing therein an abbey of prostitutes, naming several of the most abandoned courtesans, one as abbess, another as prioress; and declaring that he would fill up the rest of the offices in like manner. Repudiating his lawful consort, he carried off the wife of a certain viscount, of whom he was so desperately enamoured, that he placed on his shield the figure of this woman; affirming, that he was desirous of bearing her in battle, in the same manner as she bore him at another time. Being reprov'd and excommunicated for this by Girard bishop of Angoulesme, and ordered to renounce this illicit amour,—“ You shall curl with a comb,” said he, “ the hair that has forsaken your forehead, ere I repudiate the viscountess;” thus taunting a man, whose scanty hair required no comb. Nor did he less when Peter bishop of Poitou, a man of noted sanctity, rebuked him still more freely; and, when contumacious, began to excommunicate him publicly; for becoming furious, he seized the prelate by the hair, and flourishing his drawn sword,—“ You shall die this instant,” said he, “ unless you give me absolution.” The bishop, then, counterfeiting alarm, and asking leave to speak, boldly completed the remainder of the form of excommunication; suspending the earl so entirely from all Christian intercourse, that he should neither dare to associate nor speak with any one, unless he speedily recanted. Thus fulfilling his duty, as it appeared to him, and thirsting for the honour of martyrdom, he stretched out his neck, saying, “ Strike, strike.” But William, becoming somewhat softened, regained his usual pleasantry, and said, “ Certainly I hate you so cordially, that I will not dignify you by the effects of my anger, nor shall you ever enter heaven by the agency of my hand.” After a short time, however, tainted by the infectious insinuations of this abandoned woman, he drove the rebuker of his incest into banishment; who there, making a happy end, manifested to the world, by great and frequent miracles, how gloriously he survives in heaven. On hearing this, the earl abstained not from his inconsiderate speeches, openly declaring, that he was sorry he had not dispatched him before; that, so, his pure soul might chiefly have to thank him, through whose violence he had acquired eternal happiness. The following verses are a tribute of applause to the life and death of Peter. It was said of him when alive,—

Consumed; while study morals gave, and lore.
Virtues he rear'd, check'd faults, encouraged right,
And law: while peace, not tumult, did delight.
Help to the wretch, to sinners pardon gives,
And, for his friend, his ardour ever lives.
Busy for man was Martha; Mary's heart,
Intent on God, assumed the better part;
So 'twas in him; for God his soul possess'd,
Unmix'd: his friendless neighbour had the rest.
Rachel he loved; nor Leah's hopes deprived
Of joy; another Jacob, doubly-wived;
Dotes on the one, for beauty's matchless grace;
Regards the other, for her numerous race.

And when dead, it was said of him,—

Poor and confined, and exiled from his see,
The virtuous prelate bore each injury:
Now rich, free, fix'd, his suff'rings are made even,
For Christ he follows, and inherits heaven.
His life, religion; and a judgment sound,
His mind, adorn'd: his works his fame resound,
Reading his knowledge, and a golden mean
His words, arranged; in his decisions seen
Was law: severity his justice arm'd,
And graceful beauty in his person charm'd:
His breast was piety's perpetual stand,
The pastor's crosier well became his hand:
The pope promotes him, but the earl deprives:
Through Christ to joy eternal he survives.

§ 439. The contemporaries and associates in religion of this Peter, were Robert de Arbreisil,¹ and Bernard abbot of Tiron, the first of whom was the most celebrated and eloquent preacher of these times. So much did he excel, not in frothy, but honeyed diction, that from the gifts of persons vying with each other in making presents, he founded that noble monastery of nuns at Font-Evraud, in which every secular pleasure being extirpated, no other place possesses such multitudes of devout women, fervent in their obedience to God: for in addition to the rejection of other allurements, how great is this, that they never speak but in the chapter; the rule of constant silence being enjoined by the superior, because, when this is broken, women are prone to vain talk. The other, a noted admirer of poverty, leaving a most opulent monastery, retired with a few followers into a woody and sequestered place, and there, as the light could not be hidden under a bushel, vast numbers flocking to him, he founded a monastery, more celebrated for the piety and number of the monks, than for the splendour and extent of its riches.

§ 440. And, that England may not be supposed destitute of virtue, who can pass by Serlo, abbot of Gloucester, who advanced that place, almost from meanness and insignificance, to a glorious pitch? All England is acquainted with the considerate rule professed at Gloucester, which the weak may embrace, and the strong cannot despise. Their leader Serlo's axiom was, "Moderation in all things." Although mild to the good, he was fierce and terrific to the haughty; to corroborate which, I shall insert the verses of Godfrey the prior concerning him:—

The church's bulwark fell, when Serlo died,
Virtue's sharp sword, and justice's fond pride:
Speaker of truth, no vain discourse he loved,
And pleased the very princes he reproved:
A hasty judgment, or disorder'd state
Of life, or morals, were his utter hate,
The third of March was the propitious day,
When Serlo wing'd, through death, to life his way.

§ 441. Who can in silence pass Lanzo, who flourished at that time, equal to any in sanctity? A monk of Clugny, and prior of St. Pancras' in England; who, by his worth, so ennobled that place with the grace of monastic reverence, that it might be justly declared the peculiar habitation of virtue. As nothing I can say will equal the merits of his life, I shall merely subjoin, in the language I found it, an account of his death; that it may plainly appear, how gloriously he had lived, who died so highly favoured.

§ 442. "The affectionate Lord, who scourges every son whom He receives; who promises the just, that, as of his sufferings, so shall they be partakers of his consolation; permitted Lanzo to approach his death by such bitter sickness, during three days, that if any spot, from earthly intercourse, had adhered to his pure soul, it must, no doubt, have been wiped away by that suffering. For, as that great apostle, who reclined on the breast of our Lord, says, 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us' [1 John i. 8]; and, since Christ will judge every sin, either lightly here, or more severely hereafter, He was unwilling that any offence should be in the way of him after death, whom He knew to have loved Him with all his heart; wherefore, if there was anything which He thought worthy of reproof in Lanzo, He was desirous of exterminating it in his life-time. To this assertion his confidence in death bore witness. For when, in full health, on the fifth day of the week, before the passion of our Lord, having read the psalter, according to the daily custom of Lent, and being about to celebrate mass at the third hour, he had robed himself to the chasuble,² and had proceeded in the service till mass was on the eve of beginning, he was suddenly seized with such an acute disorder, that he himself laying aside the garments he had put on, left them not even folded up:³ and, departing from the oratory, he was afflicted for two days, without intermission, that is, till the Saturday, having no rest, either sitting, walking, standing, lying, or sleeping. During the nights, however, he never spoke to his brethren, though entreating him to break silence: but to this he did not consent, beseeching them not to sully the purity of his vow; for, since he had assumed the monastic habit, whenever he had gone out from complines, he had never spoken till the primes of the ensuing day.

³ Those who officiated were enjoined to fold up their garments.

But on the Saturday, though so convulsed as to expect dissolution every moment, he commanded the brethren, now rising for mattins, to come and anoint him; and when he was anxious to kiss them, after being anointed, as is the custom, through excess of love, he saluted them, not lying or sitting, but, though agonized to death, standing, supported in their arms. At dawn, being conducted to the chapter-house,¹ when he had taken his seat, he asked all the brethren to come before him, and giving them the paternal benediction and absolution, he entreated the like from them. He then instructed them what they were to do, in case he died: and so, returning whence he came, he passed the rest of the day, with the succeeding Sunday, rather more tranquilly: but, behold, after this, that is, after Sunday, signs of approaching death were discovered; and having his hands washed, and his hair combed, he entered the oratory to hear mass; and receiving the Body and Blood of the Lord, retired to his bed. After a short time he became speechless, gave his benediction to the brethren, singly, as they came before him, and, in like manner, to the whole society. But lifting his eyes to heaven, he attempted with both hands to bless the abbot, with all committed to his charge. Being entreated by the fraternity to be mindful of them, with the Lord, to whom he was going, he most kindly assented, by an inclination of his head. After he had done this and other similar things, he beckoned for the cross to be presented to him, which, adoring with his head, and indeed the whole of his body, and embracing with his hands, he appeared to salute with joyful lips, and to kiss with fond affection, when he distressed the standers-by with signs of departing, and being caught up in their arms, was carried, yet alive, into the presbytery, before the altar of St. Pancras. Here, surviving yet a time, and pleasing from the rosy hue of his countenance, he departed to Christ, pure, and freed eternally from every evil, at the same hour of the day on which, for his purification, he had been stricken with disease. And behold how wonderfully all things corresponded; the passion of the servant, with the passion of the Lord; the hour of approaching sickness, with the hour of approaching eternal happiness; the five days of illness, which he endured for purifying the five senses of the body, through which none can avoid sin. Moreover, from his dying ere the completion of the fifth day, we think it is signified, that he had never sinned in the last sense, which is called the touch. And what else can the third hour of the day, in which he fell sick, and by dying entered into eternal life, signify, than that the same grace of the Holy Spirit, by which we know his whole life was regulated, was evidently present to him, both in his sickness and his death? Besides, we cannot doubt but that he equalled our fathers Odo and Odilo,² both in virtue and in its reward, as a remarkable circumstance granted to them, was allowed to him also. For as the Lord permitted them to die on the octaves of those festivals which they loved beyond all other, (for St. Odo chiefly loved the feast of St. Martin, and

² Odo was founder of the Cluniac Rule, in the tenth century. Odilo was also abbot of Cluny, in the same century.

St. Odilo the nativity of our Lord, and each died on the octaves of these tides ;) so to Lanzo, who, beyond all of this age, observed the rule of St. Benedict, and venerated the holy mother of God and her solemnities with singular regard, it happened that as, according to his usual custom, both on the demise of St. Benedict, and on the festival of St. Mary, which is called the Annunciation, he celebrated high mass in the convent ; so, on the eighth day from the aforesaid anniversary of St. Benedict, being stricken with sickness, he also, on the eighth day from the Annunciation, departed to Christ. Wherefore, he who is unacquainted with the life of Lanzo, may learn from his death, how pleasing it was to God ; and will believe with us, that these things, which I have mentioned, did not happen after the common course of dying persons, as he was a man surpassed by none, in the present times, for the gift of the Holy Spirit."

§ 443. Nor ought the memory of Godfrey, prior of Winchester, to decay, who was celebrated in these times for his learning and his piety. His learning is attested by many works and epistles, composed in his familiar and pleasing style ; but principally by his epigrams, written after the manner of satires, and his verses in celebration of the chief personages of England.¹ Indeed he restored every divine office to its native grace, from the manner in which he treated it ; though before it had become obsolete from antiquity. The laws of religion and of hospitality, already happily traced out, he strongly impressed on the monks, who, to this day, so closely follow the footsteps of the prior in both, that they deserve all, or nearly all, possible commendation : indeed in this house, there is a place of entertainment to any extent, for travellers of every description, by sea or land, with boundless expense and ceaseless attention. Among other things, this holy man was noted for his humility ; so that nothing but what savoured of modesty and sweetness proceeded from this singular depository of philosophy. How great indeed must this commendation seem ! for there is hardly any one, even the least tinctured with learning, who does not appear to consider others beneath his dignity, by his haughty gestures and proud gait proclaiming the consciousness of his own erudition. However, that no perfection might be wanting to his pure soul, he kept his lowly bed for many years, equally consuming his vitals and his transgressions in the furnace of lasting sickness.

§ 444. But why should I enlarge on such characters ? there were indeed, at that time, in England, many persons illustrious both for learning and for piety ; whose virtue was the more commendable in proportion to its constancy and vigour in these degenerate times. By a blameless life, therefore, they gave credibility to ancient histories, and freed them from any suspicion of falsehood ; as they produced modern example of the possibility of doing what was there recorded. Moreover, were there any prelates apparently degenerating from the sanctity of ancient times, that is to say, skilled in secular, indolent in spiritual matters; if there were such, I say, they endeavoured to shade their failings by costly ornaments for their cathedrals. Each of them erected new churches, and adorned the bodies of their saints with silver and gold; lavish of expense, to secure the good opinion of the beholders. Among these is Ranulph¹ before-mentioned, who, being made bishop of Durham, purchased some glory for his name, by new buildings for the monks, and by regard to St. Cuthbert. His fame is exalted by his translation of the holy body, which, when taken from its resting-place, he exhibited to all who wished to behold it. Radulf, at that time abbot of Sees, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, with fortunate temerity, handled and displayed the uncorrupted body; for it had become matter of doubt with certain persons, whether the miracle of the incorruption of the corpse, which had formerly been reported, still continued. About the same time, in the monastery of Ely, under abbot Richard, the virgin relics of St. Etheldritha, subjects of amaze and reverence to the beholders, were seen entire. This monastery, lately changed by king Henry into a bishopric, had Hervey for its first prelate; who, from the scantiness of its revenues, had deserted Bangor, where he had been enthroned. And that the bishop of Lincoln might not complain of the mutilation of his diocese, the king made up his loss out of the possessions of Ely, and satisfied his claim. Indeed, whatever, in his time, was unjustly purloined, or violently taken, from the primacy of the two metropolitans of Canterbury and York, I will relate in its proper place. For having now ended the series of the kings, it seems incumbent on me to speak of that of the bishops of all England; and here I wish I had abundant matter for relation, in order that such splendid luminaries of the country might no longer be lost in obscurity. Moreover, there will perhaps be many in different parts of England, who may say, that they have heard and read some things differently related from the mode in which I have recorded them; but, if they judge candidly, they will not, on this account, brand me with censure; since, following the strict laws of history, I have asserted nothing but what I have learnt either from relators, or writers of veracity. But be these matters as they may, I especially congratulate myself as being, through Christ's assistance, the only person, or at least the first, who, since Beda, has arranged a continuous history of the English. Should any one, therefore, as I already hear it intimated, undertake, after me, a work of a similar nature, he may be indebted to me for having collected materials, though the selection from them must depend upon himself.²

§ 445. Thus much then, my venerated lord, I have had to relate, concerning the history of the English, from their first arrival in this country, till the twenty-eighth year of your father's most happy reign; the remainder will occupy a separate volume, if you

² He probably has Henry Huntingdon in view, who wrote an History of England, shortly after him.

condescend a kind regard to these. For when I had finished this work, after contemplating many characters, I determined that it ought more especially to be dedicated to you. When I examine others, I observe nobility in one; in another military science; in a third learning; justice in a fourth; but munificence in few indeed: I admire some things in one, some in another; but in you the aggregate of all. For, if ever any man was truly noble, you certainly excel in that quality, being descended from the most glorious kings and earls, and resembling them in your disposition. From the Normans, therefore, you derive your military skill; from the Flemings your personal elegance; from the French your surpassing munificence. Of your activity in war, who can doubt, when your most excellent father himself looks up to it? For whenever any tumults are reported in Normandy, he despatches you before him, in order that they may be dispelled by your valour, and that wavering peace may be restored by your sagacity. When he returns to his kingdom, he brings you with him, as a safeguard to him abroad, a delight at home, and an ornament everywhere.

§ 446. So devoted are you to literature, that though distracted by such a mass of business, you yet snatch some hours to yourself, for the purpose either of reading, or of hearing others read. Justly do you regulate, indeed, your exalted rank in life, neither omitting the toils of war for literature, nor contemning literature, as some do, for military service. Here, also, the excess of your learning appears; for, whilst you love books, you manifest how deeply you have drunk of the stream. For many things, indeed, are eagerly desired when not possessed; but no person will love philosophy who shall not have imbibed it thoroughly.

§ 447. The fame of your justice reaches even our parts; for a false sentence has never been extorted from you, either by elevation of rank or by scantiness of fortune. The person who wishes to subvert justice, finds in your breast nothing conducive to his design, either by the offering of presents, or by the charm of favour.

§ 448. Your munificence and disregard of money is amply shown by the monastery of Tewkesbury; from which, as I hear, you not only do not extort presents, but even return its voluntary offerings. You must be well aware how noble such a proceeding is, more especially at the present time; how much it redounds to your glory among men, how productive of the favour of God. Happy, then, according to Plato, is the republic whose ruler is a philosopher, whose sovereign delights not in gifts. More could I add on such subjects, did not the suspicion of flattery on my part, and commendable modesty on yours, restrain my tongue. In truth my design was not to pass by in silence the things I have uttered, in order that, by my agency, your worth might reach posterity, and that it may continue to proceed from virtue to virtue. Moreover, it was long since my intention, at the instance of certain persons, to subjoin to this work whatever I may deem of importance, according to the successive years; but it appears advisable rather to form another volume of such matters, than to be perpetually adding to that already completed. Nor can any one say, that I engage in a superfluous work, if I record the transactions of the most celebrated among the kings of his time. Indeed my lowly condition is much indebted to his greatness, and will be still more so, were it for nothing else than his being able to pride himself on such a son.¹ For, when he had most auspiciously begotten, he first commanded you to be instructed, not superficially, as plainly appears at the present day, in science; he next made you master of a most princely fortune; and, at this moment he reposes his paternal regards upon you. Let this volume then, whatever be its merits or defects, be altogether dedicated to your fame; in the next my life and my history will terminate together. Farther, kindly accept this my offering, that I, whose judgment has not erred in its choice, may be gratified by the good wishes of my patron.

PREFACE TO THE HISTORY OF HIS OWN TIMES.

Addressed to Robert, Earl of Gloucester.

To his most loving lord, Robert, son of king Henry, and earl of Gloucester, William, the Librarian of Malmesbury, wishes, after completing his victorious course on earth, eternal triumph in heaven. Many of the transactions of your father, of glorious memory, I have not omitted to record, both in the fifth book of my Regal History, and in those three smaller volumes, which I have intituled Chronicles.² Your highness is now desirous that those events which, through the miraculous power of God, have taken place in recent times, in England, should be transmitted to posterity; truly, like all your other desires, a most noble one. For what more concerns the advancement of virtue, what more conduces to justice, than to recognise the Divine favour towards good men, and his vengeance upon the wicked? What, too, more grateful, than to commit to the page of history the exploits of brave men, by whose example others may shake off their indolence, and take up arms in defence of their country? As this task is committed to my pen, I think the narrative will proceed with exacter order, if, going back a little, I trace the series of years from the return of the empress into England, after the death of her husband. First, therefore, invoking the help of God, as is fitting, and purposing to write the truth, without listening to enmity, or sacrificing to favour, I shall begin as follows.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF HIS

BOOK I.

§ 1. IN the twenty-sixth year of Henry king of England, which was in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and twenty-six, Henry emperor of Germany, to whom Matilda, the aforesaid king's daughter, had been married, died¹ in the very bloom of his life and of his conquests. Our king was, at that time, residing in Normandy, to quell whatever tumults might arise in those parts. As soon as he heard of the death of his son-in-law, he recalled his daughter, by honourable messengers despatched for that purpose. The empress, as they say, returned with reluctance, as she had become habituated to the country which was her dowry, and had large possessions there. It is well known, that several princes of Lorraine and Lombardy came, during succeeding years, repeatedly into England, to ask her in marriage; but they lost the fruit of their labours, the king designing by the marriage of his daughter, to procure peace between himself and the earl of Anjou. He was certainly, in an extraordinary degree, the greatest of all kings in the memory either of ourselves, or of our fathers: and yet, nevertheless, he ever, in some measure, dreaded the power of the earls of Anjou. Hence it arose, that he broke off and annulled the espousals² which William, his nephew, afterwards earl of Flanders, was said to be about to contract with the daughter of Fulk, earl of Anjou, who was afterwards king of Jerusalem. Hence, too, it arose, that he united a daughter of the same earl to his son William, while yet a stripling; and hence it was, that he married his daughter (of whom we began to speak), after her imperial match, to a son of the same Fulk, as my ensuing narrative will show.

§ 2. In the twenty-seventh year of his reign, in the month of September, king Henry came to England, bringing his daughter with him. But, at the ensuing Christmas, convening a great number of the clergy and nobility at London, he gave the county of Salop to his wife, the daughter of the earl of Louvain, whom he had married after the death of Matilda. Distressed that this lady had no issue, and fearing lest she should be perpetually childless, with well-founded anxiety, he turned his thoughts on a successor to the kingdom. On which subject, having held much previous and long-continued deliberation, he now at this council compelled all the nobility of England, as well as the bishops and abbots, to make oath, that, if he should die without male issue, they would, without delay or hesitation, accept his daughter Matilda, the late empress, as their sovereign; observing, how prejudicially to the country, fate had snatched away his son William, to whom the kingdom by right had pertained; and that his daughter still survived, to whom alone the legitimate succession belonged, from her grandfather, uncle, and father, who were kings, as well as from her maternal descent for many ages back: inasmuch as from Egbert, king of the West Saxons, who first subdued or expelled the other kings of the island, in the year of the Incarnation eight hundred, through a line of fourteen kings, down to the year one thousand and forty-three, in which king Edward, who lies at Westminster, was elevated to the throne, the line of royal blood did never fail nor falter in the succession.¹ Moreover, Edward, the last, and at the same time the most noble of that stock, had united² Margaret, his grand-niece by his brother Edmund Ironside, to Malcolm king of Scotland, whose daughter Matilda, as was well known, was the empress's mother.

§ 3. All, therefore, in this council, who were considered as persons of any note, took the oath: and first of all, William, archbishop of Canterbury; next, the other bishops, and the abbots in like manner. The first of the laity who swore was David, king of Scotland, uncle of the empress; then Stephen, earl of Moriton and Boulogne, nephew of king Henry by his sister Adala; then Robert, the king's son, who was born to him before he came to the throne, and whom he had created earl of Gloucester, bestowing³ on him in marriage Mabel, a noble and excellent woman; a lady as devoted to her husband as blessed in a numerous and beautiful offspring. There was a singular dispute, as they relate, between Robert and Stephen, contending, with laudable emulation, which of them should take the oath first; one alleging the privilege of a son, the other the dignity of a nephew. Thus all being bound by fealty and by oath, they, at that time, departed to their homes. But after Pentecost, the king sent his daughter into Normandy, ordering her to be betrothed, by the archbishop of Rouen, to the son of Fulk aforesaid, a youth of high nobility and noted courage; nor did he himself delay setting sail for Normandy, for the purpose of uniting them in wedlock. Which being completed, all declared prophetically, as it were, that, after his death, they would break their plighted oath. I have frequently heard Roger bishop of Salisbury say, that he was freed from the oath he had taken to the empress; for that he had sworn conditionally, that the king should not marry his daughter to any one out of the kingdom, without his consent and that of the rest of the nobility: that none of them advised the match, or indeed knew of it, except Robert earl of Gloucester, Brian the earl's son, and the bishop of Lisieux. Nor do I relate this merely because I believe the assertion of a man who knew how to accommodate himself to every change of time and fortune; but, as an historian of veracity, I write the general belief of the people.

§ 4. The remaining years of the life and reign of Henry, I must review briefly, in order that posterity may neither be defrauded of a knowledge of these events; nor that I may seem to dwell on topics little relevant to this history. In his twenty-eighth year the king returned from Normandy; in his twenty-ninth a circumstance occurred in England which may seem surprising to our long-haired gallants, who, forgetting what they were born, transform themselves into the fashion of females, by the length of their locks. A certain English knight, who prided himself on the luxuriance of his tresses, being stung by conscience on the subject, seemed to feel, in a dream, as though some person strangled him with his ringlets. Awaking in a fright, he immediately cut off all his superfluous hair. The example spread throughout England, and, as recent punishment is apt to affect the mind, almost all military men allowed their hair to be cropped in a proper manner without reluctance. But this decency was not of long continuance, for scarcely had a year expired, ere all who thought themselves courtly, relapsed into their former vice; they vied with women in length of locks, and wherever they were defective, put on false tresses, forgetful, or rather ignorant, of the saying of the apostle, "If a man nurture his hair, it is a shame to him." [1 Cor. xi. 14.]¹ In his thirtieth year [A. D. 1130], king Henry went into Normandy. Pope Honorius dying in this year, the church of Rome was agitated by great contentions about electing his successor. There were, at that time, in the city, two very celebrated cardinals, Gregory, deacon of St. Angelo, and Peter, cardinal-priest, son of Leo, prince of the Romans, both noted for learning and activity, nor could the people easily discern which of them more justly ought to be elected by the clergy. The party, however, which favoured Gregory took the lead, and ordaining him pope, called him Innocent. Moreover a rumour was disseminated among the people, that Honorius was still just alive, and had commanded this to be done. The promoters of this choice were, William, bishop of Preneste, Matthew of Albano, Conrad of Sabina, John of Ostia, Peter of Crema, cardinal of St. Chrysogonus, and Haimeric the chancellor. But the other party, after Honorius was buried, at the instigation of Peter's brothers, who were the most opulent and powerful of the Romans, having elected and consecrated him, gave him the name of Anaclet. The chief adviser and instigator to this ordination, was Peter, bishop of Portus, whose letter, if I subjoin it, will disclose the whole controversy, although it incline rather to Anaclet.

§ 5. "Peter, bishop of Portus, to the four bishops, William of Preneste, Matthew of Albano, Conrad of Sabina, and John of Ostia. How great is the tribulation of my heart for you, He only knows who knows all things; indeed you would have already been acquainted with it, in part, by my letters, did not the sentence and the common authority of the church prohibit. Of the praise or dispraise of those persons, concerning whom so many different opinions are at present given, it is not of this world to judge: there is One who may seek and judge. But if any be ready to accuse, one will be ready, and who is also bound to reply; more especially when both in your and my sight, and in that of the whole church, each of them has lived discreetly and honestly, and has hitherto executed his office impartially. It rather concerns you to abstain from idle language and the words of haste; if the question be of report, the business is far different from what your letters to me declare. In addition to this; if you regard the accounts you have published, and the order of proceeding, (with due reverence to you be it spoken,) by what boldness, by what assurance, do you presume to call that usurpation of yours an election? Why do you call that man of yours ordained, when there was no order whatever in his case? Is it thus that you have learnt to elect a pope? In a corner, in an hidden place, in darkness, and in the shadow of death? If you were desirous that a living should succeed to a dead pope, why would you give out that the deceased was still alive? It were much better, surely, to pay the last sad offices to the dead, and in this manner provide for the succour of the living; but, behold, while you seek succour for the living from the dead, you destroy both the living and the dead at the same time. Lastly, it was neither your office nor mine to elect; but rather to refuse or to approve the person elected by the brethren. Since, therefore, in neglect of the ritual, contempt of the canon, and disregard of the very anathema framed by yourselves, without consulting me your superior, or your elder brethren and superiors, or even summoning or waiting for them; when you were inexperienced, and but very few in number, you have presumed to do this; you must be sensible, from your own estimation of the case, that it must be considered void and of no avail whatever. The Lord, however, quickly came to our assistance, and pointed out a method whereby to obviate your error: for your brethren the cardinals, (who possess the chief voice in elections,) together with the whole clergy, at the request of the people, and with the consent of the nobility, openly, in the light of day, have unanimously and heartily elected the noble cardinal Peter, as Roman pontiff, by the name of Anaclet. I was present at this election, which was made according to the canons, and have confirmed it by the authority of God. The church accepts and venerates him, and by the grace of God the bishops and abbots, chief princes and barons, some by themselves and others by their delegates, acknowledge him in our presence. The robbery and cruelty you mention I do not perceive: whoever goes to him for consultation, or on business, is kindly received, and still more kindly dismissed. Return then, return to your understanding; do not make a schism in the church; do not persist in this perdition of souls; let the fear of God possess you, not worldly shame. Does any sleep, will he not add that he must rise again? Cease now from lies, in which the wicked put their hope. The lord Tiburtius hath testified by oath in writing, that I have deemed the deacon of St. Angelo the only fit person for the office of pope ; let him look to what he hath said ; I have spoken nothing in secret ; no person hath ever heard such a word as this from my mouth. My opinion always was, that till the pope was buried no mention should be made of his successor. I have held, and will hold, the unity of the church ; I will be careful to adhere to truth and justice, confidently hoping that truth and justice will set me free.” After this manner wrote the aforesaid Peter, bishop of Porto, rather partial to Peter the son of Leo. Nor did the other party at all give way ; but called Peter himself, a lion’s whelp,¹ and his partisans, the leaders of a faction. And they, indeed, acted variously among themselves under these doubtful circumstances. Innocent, however, excluded from Rome, passed the Alps and went into France. Here he was immediately received by all the Cisalpine churches ; and moreover, even king Henry, who did not easily change his opinion, willingly acknowledged him at Chartres ; and at Rouen condescended to honour him, not only with presents from himself, but also from the nobility, and even the Jews. Yet Innocent, though greatly assisted by the kings of England and France, and the emperor of Germany, could never enjoy peace, because Anaclet occupied the see of Rome. However, Anaclet himself dying in the eighth year of his usurped papacy, as it was called, Innocent enjoys the papal dignity unmolested to the present time.²

§ 6. [A. D. 1131.] In the thirty-first year of his reign, king Henry returned to England. The empress, too, in the same year, arrived on her native soil, and a full meeting of the nobility being held at Northampton, the oath of fidelity to her was renewed by such as had already sworn, and also taken by such as hitherto had not. In the same year, Louis, king of France, growing aged and unwieldy through extreme corpulency, commanded his son to be crowned as successor to the kingdom ; but being killed soon after by the fall of his horse, Louis caused another of his sons to be consecrated king, by the hands of the Roman pontiff. He, they say, does not degenerate from the ancient valour of the French, and has also acquired Aquitain as the marriage portion of his wife, which, it is well known, the kings of France have never held in their own right, since Louis, son of Charles the Great.

§ 7. [A. D. 1132.] In the thirty-first³ year of king Henry, a dreadful murrain among domestic animals extended over the whole of England : entire herds of swine suddenly perished ; whole stalls of oxen were swept off in a moment ; the same contagion continued in the following years, so that no village throughout the kingdom was free from this calamity, or able to exult at the losses of its neighbours. At this time, too, the contention between Bernard, bishop of St. David’s, and Urban of Llandaff, on the rights of their dioceses, which Urban had illegally usurped, was finally put to rest. For after being agitated by so many appeals to the court of Rome, so many expensive journeys, so many debates of lawyers for a number of years, it was at last terminated, or rather cut short, by the death of Urban at Rome; the pope also, weighing the equity of the case, did justice to the piety and right of the bishop of St. David's by a suitable judgment. In the same year, William archbishop of Canterbury personally obtained the legation of England through the indulgence of the see of Rome.

§ 8. The day before the thirty-second¹ year of his reign was completed, Henry, on the nones of August, (the very day on which he had formerly been crowned at Westminster,) set sail for Normandy. This was the last, the fatal voyage of his reign. The providence of God, at that time, bore reference in a wonderful manner to human affairs; for instance, that he should embark, never to return alive, on that day on which he had originally been crowned so long and prosperously to reign. It was then, as I have said, the nones of August; and on the fourth day of the week,² the elements manifested their sorrow at this great man's last departure. For the sun on that day, at the sixth hour, shrouded his glorious face, as the poets say, in hideous darkness, agitating the hearts of men by an eclipse; and on the sixth day of the week, early in the morning, there was so great an earthquake that the ground appeared absolutely to sink down, a horrid sound being first heard from beneath the surface. During the eclipse I saw stars around the sun; and, at the time of the earthquake the wall of the house in which I was sitting was lifted up by two shocks, and settled again with a third. The king, therefore, continued in Normandy for the space of three³ whole years, and so much longer as from the nones of August, on which day, as has been said, he crossed the sea, to the kalends of December, on which night he died. Doubtless, he performed many things worthy of record while in Normandy, but it was my design to omit whatever did not come authenticated to my knowledge. Divers expectations of his return to England were all frustrated by some adverse fate, or by the will of God. He reigned, then, thirty-five years, and from the nones of August to the kalends of December, that is, four months wanting four days. Engaged in hunting at Liuns, he was taken suddenly ill. His malady increasing, he summoned to him Hugh, whom, from prior of Lewes, he had made abbot of Reading, and afterwards archbishop of Rouen, who was justly indebted to him and his heirs for such great favours. The report of his sickness quickly gathered the nobility around him. Robert, too, his son, the earl of Gloucester, was present, who, from his unblemished fidelity and matchless virtue, has deserved to be especially signalized throughout all ages. Being interrogated by these persons as to his successor, he awarded all his territories, on either side of the sea, to his daughter, in legitimate and perpetual succession, being somewhat displeased with her husband, as he had irritated him both by threats and by certain injuries. Having passed the seventh day of his sickness, he died about midnight. I waive describing his magnanimous character in this place, as I have been diffuse upon it in the fifth book of my Regal History. In how Christian a manner he departed, the following epistle of the aforesaid archbishop of Rouen will testify.

§ 9. "To his Lord and Father, pope Innocent, his servant, Hugh, priest of Rouen, sends his humble duty. I have deemed it proper to write to your fatherly affection concerning the king my master, never to be remembered but with grief; for, being seized with sudden sickness, he wished for me to console his sufferings, and sent messengers as soon as possible for that purpose. I went and passed three melancholy days with him. Agreeably to my suggestion, he confessed his sins, he beat his breast, and he laid aside all his animosities. Through the grace of God, and through our advice and that of the bishops, he promised to attend to the amendment of his life. Under this promise, according to our office, on the third day, and three days successively, we gave him absolution. He devoutly adored the cross of our Lord, and received his Body and Blood; bestowed his alms thus, saying, 'Let my debts be paid, let the wages¹ and stipends which I owe be discharged, let the remainder be distributed to the poor. I wish they who held and do hold his treasures had done thus. At last, I earnestly stated to him our duty concerning the unction of the sick, which the church adopted from the apostle St. James; and, at his own devout request, I anointed him with holy oil. Thus he rested in peace, and may God grant him the peace he loved."

§ 10. These circumstances relating to the faith of king Henry when dying, were truly attested by the aforesaid archbishop of Rouen. The body, royally attended, and borne by the nobility in turn, was brought to Rouen, where, in a certain retired part of the principal church, it was disembowelled, lest, becoming putrid, it should offend the senses of those who approached it. The intestines were buried in the monastery of St. Mary des Prees, near the city, which, as I hear, he had honoured with no mean presents, as it had been begun by his mother. His body was kept at Caen till the season, which was then very boisterous, became more tranquil.

§ 11. In the meantime, Stephen, earl of Mortain and Boulogne, nephew of king Henry (as I have before said) who, after the king of Scotland, was the first layman that had sworn fidelity to the empress, hastened his return into England by way of Whitsand. The empress, from certain causes, as well as her brother, Robert earl of Gloucester, and almost all the nobility, delayed returning to the kingdom. However, some castles in Normandy, the principal of which was Danfront, espoused the party of the heiress. Moreover, it is well known, that on the day on which Stephen disembarked in England, there was, very early in the morning, contrary to the nature of winter in these countries, a terrible peal of thunder, with most dreadful lightning, so that the world seemed well-nigh about to be dissolved. After being acknowledged as king by the people of London and of Winchester, he gained over also Roger bishop of Salisbury, and William de Pont de l'Arche, the keepers of the royal treasures. Yet, not to conceal the truth from posterity, all his attempts would have been vain, had not his brother, Henry bishop of Winchester, who is now legate of the papal see in England, granted him his entire support; allured, indeed, by the fullest expectation that Stephen would follow the example of his grandfather William in the management of the kingdom, and more especially in the strictness of ecclesiastical discipline. In consequence, when Stephen was bound by the rigorous oath which William archbishop of Canterbury required from him, concerning restoring and preserving the liberty of the church, the bishop of Winchester became his pledge and surety. The written tenor of this oath I shall be careful hereafter to insert in its proper place.

§ 12. Stephen, therefore, was crowned king of England on Sunday, the eleventh of the kalends of January [Dec. 22], the twenty-second day after the decease of his uncle, in the year of our Lord's incarnation, one thousand one hundred and thirty-five; in the presence of three bishops, that is, the archbishop, and those of Winchester and Salisbury; but there were no abbots and scarcely any of the nobility. He was a man of activity, but imprudent; strenuous in war; of great mind in attempting works of difficulty; mild and compassionate to his enemies, and affable to all; kind as far as promise went, but sure to disappoint in its truth and execution: whence he soon afterwards neglected the advice of his brother, befriended by whose assistance, as I have said, he had supplanted his adversaries and obtained the kingdom.

§ 13. In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and thirty-six, the wind being now favourable, the body of king Henry was, immediately after Christmas, put on ship-board, and brought to England; and, in the presence of his successor in the kingdom, was buried at the monastery of Reading, which he had liberally endowed, and filled with an order of monks of singular piety. Shortly afterwards, a little before Lent, king Stephen went into Northumberland, that he might have a conference with David, king of Scotland, who was said to entertain hostile sentiments towards him. From David he readily obtained what he wished, because, being softened by the natural gentleness of his manners, or by the approach of old age, he willingly embraced the tranquillity of peace, real or pretended.

§ 14. In the same year, after Easter, Robert earl of Gloucester, of whose prudence Stephen chiefly stood in awe, came to England. While he was yet resident in Normandy, he had most earnestly considered what line of conduct he should determine upon in the present state of affairs. If he became subject to Stephen, it seemed contrary to the oath he had sworn to his sister; if he opposed him, he saw that such conduct could nothing benefit her or his nephews, but would certainly most grievously injure himself. For the king, as I said before, had an immense treasure, which his uncle had been accumulating for many years. His coin, and that of the best quality,¹ was estimated at an hundred thousand pounds; besides which there were vessels of gold and silver, of great weight and inestimable value, collected by the magnificence of preceding kings, and chiefly by Henry.² A man possessed of such boundless treasures could not want supporters, more especially as he was profuse, and, what by no means becomes a prince, even prodigal. Soldiers of all kinds, and light-armed troops, were flocking to him, chiefly from Flanders and Brittany. These were a most rapacious and violent race of men; who made no scruple to violate churchyards³ or rob a church: moreover, not only would they drag men of religious order from their horses, but also make them captive; and this was done not merely by foreigners, but even by the native soldiers, who had abhorred the tranquillity of king Henry's time, because it subjected them to a life of poverty. All these most readily resorted to the prince whom they could easily incline to their purposes, pushing their fortune at the expense of the people. Stephen, indeed, before he came to the throne, from his complacency of manners, and readiness to joke, and sit, and regale, even with low people, had gained so much on their affections as is hardly to be conceived; and already had all the nobility of England willingly acknowledged him. This most prudent earl, therefore, was extremely desirous to convince them of their misconduct, and recal them to wiser sentiments by his presence; for, to oppose Stephen's power, he was unable, from the causes aforesaid: indeed, he had not the liberty of coming to England, unless, appearing as a partaker of their revolt, he dissembled for a time his secret intentions. He did homage to the king, therefore, under a certain condition; namely, so long as he should preserve his rank entire, and maintain his engagements to him; for having long since scrutinized Stephen's disposition, he foresaw the instability of his faith.

§ 15. In the same year, soon after the earl's arrival, the bishops swore fidelity to the king, so long as he should maintain the liberty of the church and the vigour of its discipline. He himself also swore according to the tenor of the following instrument:—

“ I, Stephen, by the grace of God, elected king of England by the consent of the clergy and of the people, and consecrated by the lord William, archbishop of Canterbury and legate of the holy Roman church, and afterwards confirmed by Innocent, pope of the holy Roman see, through respect and love towards God, do grant the holy church to be free, and confirm to it all due reverence. I promise that I will neither do anything simoniacally, nor permit it to be done, in the church, or in matters ecclesiastical. The jurisdiction and power over beneficed clergy, and over all persons in orders, and their property, and the distribution of effects of ecclesiastics, I admit to be in the hands of the bishops, and confirm it so to be. I grant and appoint, that the immunities of the churches, confirmed by their charters, and their customs observed from ancient usage, do remain inviolate. All the possessions of the churches, and the tenures which they held at the death of my grandfather king William, I grant to them free, and discharged from the claim of all parties: but if the church shall hereafter claim anything as held or possessed before the death of the king, of which it is now deprived, I reserve such matter for discussion, or restitution at my will and pleasure. Moreover, whatever, since that king's death, has been obtained by the liberality of kings, or the gift of princes; by offerings, or purchase, or by any exchange of the faithful, I confirm. I pledge myself to keep peace, and do justice to all, and to preserve them to my utmost ability. I reserve to myself the forests which king William, my grandfather, and William the Second, my uncle, have made and possessed: all the rest which king Henry added, I give and grant, without molestation, to the churches and the kingdom. And if any bishop or abbot, or other ecclesiastical person, shall have properly distributed¹ his property before his death, or appointed such distribution, I allow it to remain good; but if he shall have been suddenly seized by death, before making a disposition, let the said distribution be made, at the discretion of the church, for the repose of his soul. Moreover, when the sees shall be vacant, let both them and their whole possessions be committed into the hands and custody of the clergy, or of lawful men of the same church, until a pastor be canonically appointed. I entirely do away all exactions, mischeningas,² and injustices, whether illegally introduced by the sheriffs, or any one else. I will observe the good and ancient laws and just customs, in murders, pleas, and other causes, and I command and appoint them to be so observed. Done at Oxford, in the year of our Lord, one thousand one hundred and thirty-six, in the first year of my reign."

² The progress of some of Henry's treasure is curious. Theobald, earl of Blois, gave many jewels, which had been bestowed on him by Stephen his brother, to certain abbeyes, and these again sold them for four hundred pounds to Suger, abbot of St. Denis. Henry, Suger observes, used to have them set in most magnificent drinking vessels. Suger, ap. Duchesne, iv. 345.

§ 16. The names of the witnesses, who were numerous, I disdain to particularise, because he as basely perverted almost everything, as if he had sworn only that he might manifest himself a violator of his oath to the whole kingdom. This easy man must pardon me for speaking the truth; who, had he entered on the sovereignty lawfully, and not given a ready ear to the insinuations of the malevolent in the administration of it, would have wanted little in any princely quality. Under him, therefore, the treasures of several churches were pillaged, and their landed possessions given to laymen; the churches of the clergy were sold to foreigners; the bishops made captive, or forced to alienate their property; the abbeys given to improper persons, either through the influence of friendship or for the discharge of debts. Still I think such transactions are not so much to be ascribed to him as to his advisers, who persuaded him that he ought never to want money so long as the monasteries were stored with treasure.

² It seems to have been a vexatious fine imposed on litigants when, in their pleadings, they varied from their declaration.—Murder is sometimes taken in its present acceptation; sometimes it means a certain fine levied on the inhabitants where murder had been committed.

§ 17. [A. D. 1137.] In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and thirty-seven, in the beginning of Lent, the king crossed the sea. The earl, too, having thoroughly sounded, and discovered the inclinations of such as he knew to be tenacious of their plighted oath, and arranged what he conceived proper to be done afterwards, himself embarked on Easter-day, and prosperously reached the continent. Not long after, he had very nearly experienced the malignity of adverse fortune; for the king endeavoured to intercept him by treachery, at the instigation of one William de Ipres. The earl, however, informed of it by one of the accomplices, avoided the snare prepared for him, and absented himself from the palace, whither he was repeatedly invited, for several days. The king, troubled at having succeeded so little by his artifices, and thinking to effect his design by cunning, endeavoured, by a serene countenance and gratuitous confession, to extenuate the enormity of his crime. He swore, in words framed at the earl's pleasure, never again to give countenance to such an outrage; and still more to recover his good graces, he confirmed his oath, by Hugh, archbishop of Rouen, giving his hand to Robert. This he did, it is true; but he never bestowed his unreserved friendship on that man, of whose power he was ever apprehensive. Thus, in his presence, he would pleasantly and affably call him "earl;" when he was absent, he would vilify him, and would deprive him of such portions of his estates as he was able. Robert, too, artfully eluding his duplicity, disguised his feelings, and allowing the king to depart peaceably to his kingdom, continued in Normandy, intent on his own concerns. Wherefore while Stephen, perplexed by many commotions in England, and first attacking one, and then another, justly verified what was said of Ishmael, that the hands of all were against him, and his hand against all, Robert passed that whole year in Normandy in perfect quiet. The king pointedly, as it is reported, used frequently to say of his rebellious subjects, "Since they have elected me king, why do they desert me? By the birth of God, I will never be called a fallen king!" Robert, placed as it were on an eminence, watched the event of circumstances, and earnestly revolved how he might escape, before God and man, the imputation of falsifying the oath he had sworn to his sister.

§ 18. [A. D. 1138.] In the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and thirty-eight, England was shaken with intestine commotions. For many persons, emboldened to illegal acts, either by nobility of descent or by ambition, or rather by the unbridled heat of youth, were not ashamed, some to demand castles, others estates, and indeed whatever came into their fancy, from the king: and when he delayed complying with their requests, alleging the dismemberment of his kingdom, or that others would make similar claims, or were already in possession of them; they, becoming enraged immediately, fortified their castles against him, and drove away large booties from his lands. Nor, indeed, was his spirit at all broken by the revolt of any, but attacking them suddenly in different places, he always concluded matters more to his own disadvantage than to theirs; for, after many great but fruitless labours, he gained from them, by the grant of honours or castles, a feigned and temporary peace. He created likewise many earls,¹ where there had been none before, appropriating to them possessions and rents, which rightfully belonged to the crown. They were the more greedy in asking, and he the more profuse in giving, because a rumour was pervading England, that Robert earl of Gloucester, who was in Normandy, would shortly espouse the cause of his sister, after first renouncing his fealty to the king. This report was in fact well founded: for shortly after Pentecost, despatching some of his people to Stephen, from Normandy, he, according to ancient usage, renounced his fealty and friendship, and annulled his homage; assigning as a just reason for so doing, that the king had illegally aspired to the kingdom, and neglected his plighted faith to him, not to say absolutely belied it: and, moreover, that he himself had acted contrary to law; who, after the oath sworn to his sister, had not blushed to do homage to another during her lifetime. Doubtless also his mind was biassed by the answers of many ecclesiastics, whom he had consulted upon the subject; who declared that he could by no means pass the present life without ignominy, nor deserve the happiness of the next, if he violated the oath made to paternal affection. In addition to this, he contemplated the tenor of the papal decree, commanding obedience to the oath taken in the presence of his father; a copy of which decree I shall be careful to give in my next book. Robert, who had imbibed knowledge by a copious draught from the fount of science, was aware that these things would be of great advantage to him hereafter. But the king, indignant at the spirit of the earl, deprived him, as far as he was able, of all his possessions in England, and levelled some of his castles to the ground. Bristol alone remained, which not only expelled the enemy, but even harassed the king by frequent incursions. But as it may suffice to have brought the first book of the history of our own times from the return of the empress to her father (after the death of her husband), down to this period, I shall now begin the second, from the year in which this heroine came to England, to assert her right against Stephen.

THE SECOND BOOK OF WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF HIS OWN TIMES.

BOOK II.

§ 91. [A. D. 1139.] IN the year of our Lord's incarnation, one thousand one hundred and thirty-nine, the venom of malice, which had long been nurtured in the breast of Stephen, at length openly burst forth. Rumours were prevalent in England, that earl Robert was on the very eve of coming from Normandy with his sister; and when, under such an expectation, many persons revolted from the king, not only in inclination but in deed, he avenged himself for this injury at the cost of numbers. He also, to his disgrace as a king, seized many when at court, through mere suspicion of hostility to him, and obliged them to surrender their castles, and accede to any conditions he prescribed. There were at that time two very powerful bishops in England, Roger of Salisbury, and his fraternal nephew, Alexander of Lincoln. Alexander had built the castle of Newark, as he said, for the defence and dignity of the bishopric. Roger, who wished to manifest his magnificence by building, had erected extensive castles at Shireburn, and more especially at Devizes. At Malmesbury, even in the churchyard, and scarcely a stone's throw from the principal church, he had begun a castle. He had gotten into his custody the castle of Salisbury, which, being royal property, he had obtained from king Henry, and surrounded with a wall. Some powerful laymen, hurt at the probability of being surpassed by the clergy in extent of riches and magnitude of their towns, took offence at this, and fostered the latent wound of envy in their bosoms. Wherefore they poured forth their imagined grievances to the king; observing that the bishops, regardless of their order, were mad for erecting castles: that none could doubt but that they were designed for the overthrow of the king; for as soon as the empress should arrive, they would, induced doubtless by the recollection of her father's kindness to them, immediately greet their sovereign with the surrender of their fortresses: that therefore they ought to be prevented, and compelled to give up their strongholds; otherwise the king would repent too late, when he saw in the power of the enemy that which, had he been wise, he might have applied to his own purpose. Such were the frequent insinuations of the nobility. The king, though far too partial to them, for some time pretended not to listen to what gratified his ear so much; assuaging the bitterness of delay, either by his respect for the piety of the bishops, or, as I rather think, from apprehension of the odium he might incur by seizing their castles. Finally, he only postponed the execution of what the nobles had urged him to, till an opportunity presented itself for his purpose; which was as follows:

§ 20. A great assembly of the nobles being held at Oxford about the eighth of the kalends of July [June 24], the prelates above-mentioned also repaired thither. The bishop of Salisbury set out on this expedition with great reluctance; for I heard him speaking to the following purport: "By my Lady St. Mary, I know not why, but my heart revolts at this journey; this I am sure of, that I shall be of much the same service at court as a foal is in battle:" thus did his mind forbode future evils. Here, as though fortune would seem subservient to the king's wishes, a quarrel arose between the servants of the bishops and those of Alan, earl of Brittany, about a right to quarters, which had a melancholy termination; as the bishop of Salisbury's retainers, then sitting at table, left their meal unfinished and rushed to the contest. At first, they contended with reproaches, afterwards with swords. The domestics of Alan were put to flight, and his nephew nearly killed: nor was the victory gained without bloodshed on the bishops' side; for many were wounded, and one knight¹ even slain. The king, eagerly seizing the opportunity, ordered the bishops to be convened by his old instigators, that they might make satisfaction to his court, as their people had infringed his peace: and that this satisfaction should be, the delivery of the keys of their castles, as pledges of their fidelity. Though prepared to make compensation, they hesitated at the surrender of their fortresses; and in consequence, lest they should depart, he ordered them into close confinement. So he took bishop Roger unfettered, but the chancellor, the nephew, (or as it was reported, more than the nephew,) of the bishop, in chains, to Devizes; intending, if he could, to get possession of the castle, which was erected at great and almost incalculable expense, not, as the prelate himself used to say, for the ornament, but as the real fact is, to the detriment of the church. At the first summons, the castles of Salisbury, Shireburn, and Malmesbury, were yielded to the king; Devizes also surrendered at the end of three days, after the bishop had voluntarily enjoined himself abstinence from all food, that by his personal sufferings he might work upon the mind of the bishop of Ely, who had taken possession of it.² Nor did Alexander bishop of Lincoln act more perseveringly; for he purchased his liberty by the surrender of his castles of Newark and Sleaford.³

§ 21. This transaction on the part of the king gave rise to the expression of many different opinions. Some observed that the bishops were justly dispossessed of their castles, as they had built them in opposition to the injunction of the canons; they ought to be preachers of peace, not builders of houses which might be a refuge for evil-doers. Such was the doctrine enforced, with ampler reasons and discourses, by Hugh archbishop of Rouen ; as far as his eloquence extended, the strenuous champion of the king. Others took the opposite side of the question ; among whom was Henry bishop of Winchester, legate of England from the papal see, and brother to king Stephen, as I have said before, whom neither fraternal affection nor fear of danger could turn aside from the path of truth. He spake to this effect : “ If the bishops had in anything overpassed the bounds of justice, the judging them did not pertain to the king, but to the ecclesiastical canons ; that they ought not to be deprived of any possession but by a public and ecclesiastical council ; that the king had not acted from zealous regard to right, but with a view to his own advantage ; as he had not restored the castles to the churches, at whose expense, and on whose land, they were built, but had delivered them to laymen, and those by no means of religious character.” Though the legate made these declarations, not only privately, but publicly also before the king, and urged him to the liberation and restitution of the bishops, yet being entirely disregarded, he lost his labour. In consequence, deeming it proper to resort to canonical power, he summoned his brother, without delay, to be present at a council he intended to hold at Winchester, on the fourth of the kalends of September [Aug. 29].

² The author of the "Gesta Stephani" says, the king ordered both bishops to be kept without food, and threatened, moreover, to hang the son of bishop Roger. Gest Stephani, 944. The continuator of Flor. Wigorn. adds, that one was confined in the crib of an ox-lodge, the other in a vile hovel, A. D. 1138.

§ 22. On the appointed day, almost all the bishops of England, with Theobald archbishop of Canterbury, who had succeeded William, came to Winchester. Turstin, archbishop of York, excused himself, on account of the malady with which he was afflicted ; for he was so enfeebled as to be hardly able to guide his steps : the others apologized for their absence, by letter, by reason of the war. The bull of pope Innocent was first read in the council, whereby, even from the kalends of March, if I rightly remember, he had enjoined the administration of his anxious charge to the lord bishop of Winchester, as legate in England. This was received with much goodwill, as the bishop had shown his forbearance, by the lapse of time, and had not proclaimed himself legate with precipitate vanity. Next followed, in the council, his address, in the Latin tongue, directed to the learned, on the disgraceful detention of the bishops ; of whom the bishop of Salisbury had been seized in a chamber of the palace, Lincoln in his lodgings, and Ely, fearing a similar treatment, had escaped the calamity by a hasty retreat to Devizes : he observed, that it was a dreadful crime, that the king should be so led away by sinister persons, as to have ordered violent hands to be laid on his subjects, more especially bishops, in the security of his court ; that, to the king’s disgrace, was to be added the offence against God, in despoiling the churches of their possessions, under pretext of the criminality of the prelates ; that the king’s outrage against the law of God was matter of such pain to him, that he had rather himself suffer grievous injury, both in person and property, than have the episcopal dignity so basely humiliated ; moreover, that the king, being repeatedly admonished to amend his fault, had at last not refused that the council should be summoned : that, therefore, the archbishop and the rest should deliberate what was proper to be done ; and he would not be wanting to execute the sentence of the council, either through regard to the friendship of the king, who was his brother, or loss of property, or even danger of life.

§ 23. When he had gradually expiated on these matters, the king, not distrusting his cause, sent certain earls¹ into the council, to demand wherefore he was summoned. The legate briefly replied: That, when he recollected he was in subjection to the faith of Christ, he ought not to be displeased, if, when guilty of a crime such as the present age had never witnessed, he was required, by the ministers of Christ, to make satisfaction; that it was the act of heathen nations to imprison bishops, and divest them of their possessions; that they should tell his brother, therefore, that if he would deign a patient assent to his advice, he would give him such, by the authority of God, as neither the church of Rome, nor the French king's court, nor even earl Theobald, their common brother, a man of surpassing sense and piety, could reasonably oppose; but such as they ought favourably to embrace; that, at present, the king would act advisedly, if he would either account for his conduct, or submit to canonical judgment; it was, moreover, a debt he owed, to favour the church, by whose fostering care, not by military force, he had been promoted to the kingdom. The earls retiring after this speech, returned shortly with an answer prepared. They were accompanied by one Alberic de Ver, a man deeply versed in legal affairs. He reported the king's answer, and aggravated as much as possible the case of bishop Roger, for bishop Alexander, whom he supported, had departed; but this he did with moderation and without using opprobrious language, though some of the earls, standing by, repeatedly interrupted his harangue, by casting reproaches on the bishop.

§ 24. The sum of what Alberic had to allege, was as follows: That bishop Roger had greatly injured king Stephen; that he seldom came to court but his people, presuming on his power, excited tumults; that they had frequently at other places, and very lately at Oxford, attacked the attendants, and even the nephew of earl Alan, as well as the servants of Hervy de Liuns, a man of such high nobility, and so extremely haughty, that he had never deigned to visit England, though king Henry had invited him; that the injury, therefore, of such violence having been offered him, doubly recoiled on king Stephen, through respect to whom he had come hither; that the bishop of Lincoln had been the author of the tumult excited by his followers, from ancient enmity to Alan; that the bishop of Salisbury secretly favoured the king's enemies, though he disguised his subtlety for the moment; that the king had discovered this beyond all doubt, from many circumstances; more especially, however, from the said bishop having refused permission to Roger de Mortimer, with the king's soldiers whom he was conducting, when under the greatest apprehensions from the garrison of Bristol, to continue even a single night at Malmesbury; that it was in every person's mouth, that as soon as the empress should arrive, he would join her party, with his nephews and his castles; that Roger, in consequence, was made captive, not as a bishop, but as the king's servant, who had administered his affairs and received his wages; that the king had not taken their castles by violence, but that both bishops had surrendered them voluntarily, to escape the punishment due to the disturbance they had excited in the court; that the king had found some trifling sums of money in the castles, which must lawfully belong to himself, as bishop Roger had collected it from the revenues of the exchequer, in the times of his uncle and predecessor, king Henry; that the bishop had readily relinquished this money, as well as the castles, through consciousness of his offences, of which the king did not want witnesses; that, therefore, it was his will that the conditions entered into by himself and the bishops should remain in force.

§ 25. It was rejoined, by bishop Roger, in opposition to the speech of Alberic, that he had never been the minister of king Stephen, nor had he received his wages. This spirited man, too, who blushed at being cast down by adversity, threatened, that if he could not have justice from that council, for the property which had been wrested from him, he would seek it in the audience of an higher court. The legate, mildly, as usual, observed, that every allegation against the bishops ought to be made, and the truth of it inquired into, in an ecclesiastical court, before passing sentence, contrary to the canons, on innocent persons; that the king ought, therefore, to do as was incumbent in civil courts, that is, re-invest the bishops with their own property, otherwise, being disseized, by the law of nations they would not plead.

§ 26. Many arguments of this kind being used on both sides, the cause, at the king's request, was adjourned to the next day; then, on the morrow, prolonged still a day farther, till the arrival of the archbishop of Rouen. When he came, while all were anxious to hear what he had to allege, he said he was willing to allow the bishops their castles, if they could prove by the canons that they ought justly to possess them; but as they were not able to do this, it was the height of impudence to contend against the canons. "And admitting," said he, "that it be just for them to possess castles, yet most assuredly, as the times are eventful, all chiefs, after the custom of other nations, ought to deliver up the keys of their fortifications to the will of the king, who is bound to wage war for the common security." Thus the whole plea of the bishops was shaken: for, either according to the decrees of the canons, it was unjust for them to have castles; or, if that were allowed by the king's indulgence, they ought to yield to the emergency of the times, and give up the keys.

§ 27. To this the aforesaid pleader, Alberic, added, that, it had been signified to the king, that the bishops murmured among themselves, and had even made preparation for some of their party to proceed to Rome against him. "And this," said he, "the king advises that none of you presume to do; for if any person shall go from England to any place, in opposition to him and to the dignity of his kingdom, perhaps his return may not be so easy. Moreover, he, as he sees himself aggrieved, of his own accord summons you to Rome."

§ 28. When the king had sent such a message, partly advising, and partly threatening, it was perceived what was his design. In consequence, the council broke up, as he would not submit to canonical censure, and the bishops deemed it unadvisable to enforce it against him for two reasons; first, because it was a rash act to excommunicate the king without the knowledge of the pope; secondly, because they understood, or some of them even saw, that swords were unsheathed around them. It was no longer a joking matter, but a struggle for life and death. The legate and the archbishop, still, however, were anxiously observant of their duty. They humbly prostrated themselves before the king in his chamber, entreating him to take pity on the church, and to consider his soul and his reputation; and that he would not suffer a schism to be made between the empire and the priesthood. Although he, in some measure, removed the odium of his former conduct, by condescendingly rising to them, yet, prevented by ill advice, he carried none of his fair promises into effect.

§ 29. The council broke up on the kalends of September [Sept. 1]; and on the day previous to the kalends of October [Sept. 30], earl Robert, having at length surmounted every cause of delay, arrived with the empress, his sister, in England, relying on the protection of God and the observance of his lawful oath; but with a much smaller military force than any other person would have required for so perilous an enterprise; for he had not with him, at that time, more than one hundred and forty horsemen. My assertion is supported by persons of veracity; and did it not look like flattery, I would say that he was not inferior to Julius Cæsar, at least in resolution, whom Livy¹ relates to have had but five cohorts, when he began the civil war, and with which he attacked the world. But the comparison between Julius and Robert is invidious; for Julius, an alien to the true faith, reposed his hope on his good fortune, as he used to say, and the valour of his legions; Robert, celebrated for Christian piety, relied only on the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and the Lady St. Mary. The former had partisans in Gaul, in parts of Germany, and Brittany; and had attached to him, by means of presents, all the Roman people, with the exception of the senate; the latter, with the exception of a very few who regarded their plighted oath, found the nobility in England either opposing or affording him no assistance. He landed, then, at Arundel, and, for a time, delivered his sister into the safe keeping, as he supposed, of her mother-in-law, whom Henry, as I have before related, had married on the death of the empress's mother. He himself proceeded through the hostile country to Bristol, accompanied, as I have heard, by scarcely twelve horsemen, and was joined in the midst of his journey by Brian the earl's son from Wallingford. Nor was it long ere he learnt that his sister had quitted Arundel; for her mother-in-law, through female inconstancy, had broken the faith she had repeatedly pledged by messengers sent into Normandy. The king, therefore, placed the empress under the care of Henry bishop of Winchester, and Waleran earl of Meulan for safe-conduct; a favour never denied to the most inveterate enemy by honourable soldiers. Waleran, indeed, declined going farther than Calne; but the bishop continued his route. The earl, therefore, quickly collecting his troops, came to the boundary appointed by the king, and placed his sister in safer quarters at Bristol. She was afterwards received into Gloucester by Milo, who held the castle of that city under the earl in the time of king Henry, doing him homage and swearing fidelity to him; for this is the chief city of his county.

§ 30. On the nones of October [Oct. 7] one Robert Fitz-Hubert, a savage barbarian, by night clandestinely entering the castle of Malmesbury, which bishop Roger had inauspiciously founded, and burning the town, boasted of the deed, as though he had gained a great triumph. But, within a fortnight, his joy was at an end, being put to flight by the king. Stephen, in the meantime, commanded possession to be kept of the castle, until, on the restoration of peace, it might be destroyed. The king, moreover, before he came to Malmesbury, had occupied and placed a garrison in a small fortress called Cerney, belonging to the aforesaid Milo. In consequence, thinking that he should be equally successful elsewhere as at that place and at Malmesbury, he assailed a castle called Trowbridge, belonging to Humphrey de Bohun, who was on the side of the empress, but he departed without success.

§ 31. The whole country, then, around Gloucester, to the extremity of Wales, partly by force, and partly by favour, in the course of the remaining months of that year, gradually espoused the side of the empress. The owners of certain castles, securing themselves within their fastnesses, waited the issue of events. The city of Hereford was taken without difficulty; the few soldiers, who, determining on resistance, had thrown themselves into the castle, being blockaded therein. The king drew nigh, if possible, to devise means for their assistance; but, frustrated in his attempt, he retired with disgrace. He also approached Bristol, and going beyond it, burnt the neighbourhood around Dunstore, leaving nothing, as far as he was able, which could afford sustenance for his enemies, or advantage to any one.

§ 32. On the third of the ides of December [Dec. 11], death kindly relieved Roger bishop of Salisbury from the quartan ague which had long afflicted him. They assert that his sickness was brought upon him through grief at the severe and repeated injuries he had received from king Stephen. To me it appears that God exhibited him to the wealthy as an example of the mutability of fortune, in order that they should not trust in uncertain riches, which, as the apostle¹ says, "while some have coveted, they have made shipwreck of their faith." He first ingratiated himself with prince Henry, who became afterwards king, by his prudence in the management of domestic matters, and by restraining the excesses of his household. For, before his accession, Henry had been careful and economical in his expenses, compelled thereto by the scantiness of his resources, and the illiberal treatment of his brothers, William and Robert. Knowing his disposition in this way, Roger had deserved so well of him in his time of need, that, when he came to the throne, he denied him scarcely anything he thought proper to ask; he gave him estates, churches, prebends, entire abbeys of monks; and, lastly, committed even the kingdom to his fidelity: he made him chancellor in the beginning of his reign, and not long after, bishop of Salisbury. Roger, therefore, decided causes; he regulated the expenditure; he had charge of the treasury. Such were his occupations when the king was in England; such, without associate or inspector, when he resided in Normandy, which took place repeatedly, and for a long time together. And not only the king, but the nobility, even those who were secretly stung with envy at his good fortune, and more especially the ministers and debtors of the king, gave him almost whatever he could fancy. If there was anything contiguous to his property which might be advantageous to him, he would directly extort it, either by entreaty or purchase; or, if that failed, by force. With unrivalled magnificence in their construction, as our times may recollect, he erected splendid mansions on all his estates; in merely maintaining which, the labour of his successors shall toil in vain. His cathedral he dignified to the utmost with matchless ornaments, and buildings on which no expense was spared. It was truly wonderful to behold in this man what abundant power attended him in every kind of dignity, and flowed, as it were, to his hand. How great was the glory, (indeed, what could exceed it?) that he should have made his two nephews—by virtue of the education which he bestowed upon them, men of noted learning and industry—bishops; and not of mean sees, but of Lincoln and Ely, than which I know not whether there be more opulent in England! He was sensible of his power, and, somewhat more harshly than became such a character, abused the favours of Heaven. Lastly, as the poet observes of some rich man,¹ so Roger attempted to turn abbeys into bishoprics, and bishoprics into abbeys. The most ancient monasteries of Malmesbury and Abbotsbury, he annexed, as far as he was able, to his see; he changed the priory of Shireburn, which is subject to the bishop of Salisbury, into an abbey; and the abbey of Hortun was forthwith dissolved and united to it. These events took place in the time of king Henry, under whom, as I have observed, his prosperity reached its zenith; for under Stephen, as I have before related, it began to decline; except that in the beginning of his reign, he obtained for one of his nephews the chancellorship; for the other the office of treasurer; and for himself the town of Malmesbury; the king repeating often to his companions, “By the birth of God, I would give him half England, if he asked for it; till the time be ripe, he shall tire of asking, ere I tire of giving.” But fortune, who, in former times, had flattered him so long and so transcendently, at last cruelly pierced him with her scorpion-sting. Such was that instance, when he saw those whom he dearly regarded, wounded, and his most favoured knight killed before his face; the next day, himself, as I said before, and his nephews, very powerful bishops, the first compelled to fly, the second detained, and the third, a young man to whom he was greatly attached, bound with chains; on the surrender of his castles, his treasures pillaged, and himself afterwards, in the council, loaded with the most disgraceful reproaches: finally, when he was on his death-bed at Salisbury, the residue of his money and utensils, which he had placed upon the altar for the purpose of completing the church, were carried off against his will. The height of his calamity was, I think, a circumstance which even I cannot help commiserating; that, though he appeared wretched to many, yet there were very few who pitied him; so much envy and hatred had his excessive power drawn on him, and undeservedly, too, from some of those very persons whom he had advanced to honour.

§ 33. In the year of the Incarnate Word one thousand one hundred and forty, the monks of those abbeys, which Roger had unjustifiably usurped, waiting on the king, were permitted to enjoy their ancient privileges, and abbots, as formerly. John, a monk of that place, a man highly celebrated for the affability of his manners and the liberality of his mind, was elected abbot of Malmesbury by the monks, according to the tenor of the privilege which St. Aldhelm had obtained from pope Sergius four hundred and sixty-six years before, and had caused to be confirmed by the kings, Ina of the West Saxons, and Ethelred of the Mercians. The legate approved the claim, but disapproved of the person; for he could not be induced to believe that the king had consented to the election but by a gift in money. And, indeed, a small sum had been promised, on the score of liberating the church, not for the election of the person. Wherefore, John, though removed by a premature death within the year, still left a lasting and laudable memory of himself to all succeeding ages. For no monk of that place, I confess the truth, would have pursued a task of such difficulty, had not John begun it. Wherefore let his successors be praised, if they shall preserve the liberty of that church; he certainly rescued it from thralldom.

§ 34. The whole of this year was embittered by the horrors of war. There were many castles throughout England, each defending, or more properly speaking, laying waste, its neighbourhood. The garrisons drove off from the fields, both sheep and cattle, sparing neither churches nor churchyards. Seizing¹ such of the vavassours² and country-people as were reputed to be possessed of money, they compelled them, by extreme torture, to promise whatever they thought fit. Plundering the houses of the wretched husbandmen, even to their very beds, they cast them into prison; nor did they liberate them, but on their giving everything they possessed, or could by any means scrape together, for their release. Many calmly expired in the midst of torments inflicted to compel them to ransom themselves, bewailing, which was all they could do, their miseries to God. At the instance of the earl, indeed, the legate, with the bishops, repeatedly excommunicated all violators of churchyards and plunderers of churches, and those who laid violent hands on men in holy or monastic orders, or their servants; but this his attention profited but little. It was distressing, therefore, to see England, once the fondest cherisher of peace and the signal home of tranquillity, reduced to such a pitch of misery, that not even the bishops or monks could pass in safety from one town to another. Under king Henry, many foreigners, who had been driven from home by the commotions of their native land, were accustomed to resort to England, and rest in quiet under his fostering protection; in Stephen's time, numbers of freebooters from Flanders and Brittany flocked to England, in expectation of rich pillage. Meanwhile, the earl of Gloucester conducted himself with caution, and his most earnest endeavours were directed to gaining conquests with the smallest loss to his adherents. Such of the English nobility as he could not prevail upon to regard the obligation of their oath, he held it sufficient if he could so restrain, that, if they did not assist, they would not injure the cause; being willing, according to the saying of the comic writer, to do what he could, when he could not do what he would. But when he saw the opportunity present itself, he strenuously performed the duty both of soldier and of general; more especially he valiantly subdued those strongholds, which were of signal detriment to the cause he had espoused; that¹ is to say, Harpetrey, which king Stephen had taken from certain soldiers of the earl before he came to England, and many others; Sudley, Cerney, which the king had garrisoned, as I have said; and the castle which Stephen had fortified over against Wallingford he levelled to the ground. He also, in these difficult times, created his brother Rainald, earl of Cornwall. Nor, indeed, did the king show less spirit in performing the duties of his station; for he omitted no occasion of repeatedly beating off his adversaries, and defending his own possessions. But he failed of success, and his affairs grew worse for lack of justice. Dearth of provisions, too, increased by degrees; and the scarcity of good money was so great, from being counterfeited, that sometimes, out of ten or more shillings, hardly a dozen pence would be received. The king himself was reported to have ordered the weight of the penny, as established in king Henry's time, to be reduced, because, having exhausted the vast treasures of his predecessor, he was unable to provide for the expense of so many soldiers. All things, then, became venal in England; and churches and abbeys were no longer secretly, but even publicly, exposed to sale.

§ 35. During this year, in Lent, on the thirteenth of the kalends of April [March 20], at the ninth hour of the fourth day of the week, there was an eclipse, throughout England, as I have heard. With us, indeed, and with all our neighbours, the obscuration of the sun was so remarkable, that persons sitting at table, as it then happened almost everywhere, (for it was Lent,¹) at first feared that chaos was come again; afterwards learning its cause, they went out, and beheld the stars around the sun. It was thought and said by many, not untruly, that the king would not continue a year in the government.

§ 36. In the following week, that is, during the time of the Passion, on the seventh of the kalends of April [March 26], the fore-mentioned barbarian,² Robert Fitz-Hubert, a character well calculated for the stratagems of war, surprised the castle of Devizes.³ He was a man by far the most cruel of any within the circle of this age's memory; and blasphemous, also, towards God: he used voluntarily to boast of having been present at a place where twenty-four monks were burnt, together with the church; declaring, that he, too, would frequently do the like in England, and grieve God, by the plunder of the church of Wilton, and the destruction of Malmesbury, with the slaughter of all its monks; that he would return them this good office, because they had admitted the king, to his disadvantage; for of this he accused them, though without foundation. I myself have heard, when, at any time, which was extremely rare indeed, he liberated his captives without torture, and they thanked him for it, on the part of God, I have heard him, I say, reply; "Never let God owe me any thanks." He used to expose his prisoners, naked and rubbed with honey, to the burning heat of the sun; thereby exciting flies, and other insects of that kind, to sting them. But, having now got possession of Devizes, he hesitated not to boast, that he should gain, by means of this castle, the whole district from Winchester to London; and that he would send to Flanders for soldiers to defend him. While meditating, however, such a scheme, Divine vengeance overtook him, through the agency of John Fitz-Gilbert, a man of surprising subtlety, who held the castle at Marlborough: for being thrown into chains by him, because he refused to surrender Devizes to his sovereign, the empress, he was hanged, like a common thief. Wonderful was the judgment of God on this sacrilegious wretch, that he should meet with such an ignominious end, not from the king, to whom he was inimical, but from the very persons he appeared to favour. The authors of his death ought worthily to be extolled, for having freed the country from such a pest, and justly dispatched an intestine enemy.

§ 37. In the same year, during Pentecost [May 26], the king resided at London, in the Tower, attended only by the bishop of Sees, for the others disdained, or feared, to come thither. Some little time after, by the mediation of the legate, a conference was appointed between the empress and the king, that, if possible, by God's help, peace might be restored. The conference was held near Bath; on the part of the empress were sent her brother Robert, and others of her friends; on the king's, the legate, the archbishop, and also the queen. But they wasted words and time, to no purpose, and departed without being able to conclude a peace. Nor was the ground of separation equal on both sides, as the empress, more inclined to justice, had declared, that she was not averse to the decision of the church; but the king's party were averse to this, so long as they could make their ascendancy over him answer their own purposes. In September following, the legate, who knew that it was the especial duty of his office to restore peace, undertaking the toil of a foreign voyage for its accomplishment, hastened to sail over to France. After a long and anxious discussion, for tranquilizing England, had taken place, between the king of France, count Thibaut, and many of the clergy, he returned, nearly at the end of November, bringing back counsels wholesome for the country, could they have been carried into effect. And indeed the empress and the earl assented to them immediately, but the king delayed from day to day, and finally rejected them altogether. Upon this, at last, the legate discontinued his exertions, waiting, like the rest, for the issue of events: for what avails it to swim against the stream? and, as some one observes, "To seek odium only by one's labours is the height of madness."

PREFACE TO BOOK III.

I NOW attempt¹ to give a clue to the mazy labyrinth of events and transactions which occurred in England, during the year one thousand one hundred and forty-one,² lest posterity, through my neglect, should be unacquainted with them; as it is of service, to know the volubility of fortune, and the mutability of human estate, God only permitting or ordaining them. And, as the moderns greatly and deservedly blame our predecessors, for having left no memorial of themselves or their transactions, since the days of Beda, I think I ought to be very favourably regarded by my readers, if they judge rightly, for determining to remove this reproach from our times.

THE THIRD BOOK OF WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF HIS OWN TIMES.

BOOK III.

§ 38. KING STEPHEN had peaceably departed from the county of Lincoln before Christmas, and had augmented the honours of the earl of Chester, and of his brother; of whom the earl, long since, in the time of king Henry, had been married to the daughter of the earl of Gloucester. In the meanwhile, the citizens of Lincoln, who wished to acquire great favour with the king, certified him by a message, when resident in London, that the two brothers had taken up their abode in security, in the castle of that city; and that, suspecting nothing less than the arrival of the king, they might be very easily surprised, while they themselves would provide that he should get possession of the castle as secretly as possible. As Stephen never wished to neglect any opportunity of augmenting his power, he gladly repaired thither. In consequence, the brothers were surprised, and besieged, even in the Christmas holidays. This step appeared unjustifiable to many, because, as I have observed, he had left them before the festival, without any suspicion of enmity; nor had he, even now, after ancient usage, abjured his friendship with them, which they call "defying." However, the earl of Chester, though surrounded with imminent dangers, adroitly escaped from the castle. By what management this was accomplished, I know not; whether through consent of some of the besiegers, or whether because valour, when taken by surprise, frequently tries a variety of methods, and often discovers a remedy for its emergencies. Not content with his own escape, he earnestly deliberated, how to devise the safety of his brother and of his wife, whom he had left in the fortress. The more prudent mode seemed to be, to request assistance from his father-in-law, although he had long since offended him, on many accounts; but principally because he appeared staunch to neither party. He sent messengers, therefore, promising eternal fidelity to the empress, if, induced more by affectionate regard than any desert of his, he would rescue those from danger, who were already in the very jaws of captivity.

§ 39. Unable to endure this indignity, the earl of Gloucester readily assented. Weary of delay, too, as the fairest country was harassed with intestine rapine and slaughter for the sake of two persons, he preferred bringing the matter to an issue at once, would God permit. He hoped also for the Divine assistance on his undertaking, as the king had molested his son-in-law, without any fault on his part; was at that moment besieging his daughter; and had castellated the church of the holy mother of God, in Lincoln. How much ought these things to weigh in the mind of a prince? Would it not be better to die, and fall with honour, than endure so marked a disgrace? For the sake then of avenging God, and his sister, and liberating his relations, he entered on this perilous undertaking. The supporters of his party readily accompanied him; the major part of whom being deprived of their inheritances, were instigated to hostility by rage at their losses, and the consciousness of their valour. However, during the whole extended march from Gloucester to Lincoln, he studiously concealed his intention, leaving all the army, with the exception of a very few, in suspense, by his mysterious conduct.

§ 40. At length, on the day of the Purification of the blessed Mary [Feb. 2], they arrived at the river flowing between the two armies, called the Trent, which, from its springs, together with floods of rain, had risen so high, that it could not possibly be forded. Here, at last, disclosing his intention to his son-in-law, who had joined him with a strong force, and to those he had brought with him, he added, that he had long since made up his mind, never to be induced to fly, be the emergency what it might; if they could not conquer, they must die, or be taken. All encouraged him to hope the best; and wonderful to hear, though on the eve of hazarding a battle, he swam over the rapid river I have mentioned, with the whole of his party. So great was the earl's ardour to put an end to calamity, that he preferred risking extremities, to prolonging the sufferings of the country. The king, too, with many earls, and an active body of cavalry, abandoning the siege, courageously presented himself for battle. The royalists began the prelude to the fight, which they call the "joust,"¹ as they were skilled in that exercise; but when they saw that the consular party, if they may be so called, did not attack from a distance, with lances, but at close-quarters, with swords, and broke the king's ranks with violent and determined onset, the earls, to a man,² (for six of them had entered the conflict together with the king,) consulted their safety by flight. A few barons of laudable fidelity and valour, who would not desert him, even in his necessity, were made captive. The king, though he by no means wanted spirit to defend himself, being at last attacked on every side by the earl of Gloucester's soldiers, fell to the ground by a blow from a stone; but who was the author of this deed is uncertain. Thus, when all around him were either taken or dispersed, he was compelled to yield to circumstances and become a captive. On which the truly noble earl of Gloucester commanded the king to be preserved uninjured, not suffering him to be molested, even with a reproach; and the person, whom he had just before fiercely attacked when dignified with the sovereignty, he now calmly protected when subdued; that, the tumults of anger and of joy being quieted, he might show kindness to his relation, and respect the dignity of the diadem in the captive. The citizens of Lincoln were slaughtered on all sides by the just indignation of the victors, and without commiseration on the part of the conquered, as they had been the origin and fomenters of this calamity.

§ 41. The king, according to the custom of such as are called captives, was presented to the empress, at Gloucester, by her brother, and afterwards conducted to Bristol. Here at first he was kept with every mark of honour, except the liberty of going at large; but in succeeding time, through the presumption of certain persons, who said openly and contumeliously, that it did not behove the earl to treat the king otherwise than they chose; and also, because it was reported, that, having either eluded or bribed his keepers, he had been found, more than once, beyond the appointed limits, more especially in the night time, he was confined with fetters.

§ 42. In the meanwhile, both the empress and the earl dealt by messengers with the legate his brother, that he should forthwith receive her into the church,¹ and to the kingdom, as the daughter of king Henry, to whom all England and Normandy had sworn allegiance. This year, the first Sunday in Lent happened on the fourteenth of the kalends of March [Feb. 16]. By means of negotiators on both sides, the business was so far forwarded, that they agreed to meet in conference, on an open plain on this side of Winchester. They assembled, therefore, on the third Sunday in Lent [March 2], a day dark and rainy, as though the fates would portend a woful change in this affair. The empress swore, and pledged her faith to the bishop, that all matters of importance in England, and especially the bestowing of bishoprics and abbeys, should be under his control, if he, with the holy church, would receive her as sovereign, and observe perpetual fidelity towards her. Her brother, Robert, earl of Gloucester, swore as she did, and pledged his faith for her, as did also Brian Fitz-Count, lord Marcher² of Wallingford, and Milo of Gloucester, afterwards earl of Hereford, with some others. Nor did the bishop hesitate to receive the empress as sovereign of England, and, together with certain of his party, to pledge his faith, that so long as she did not infringe the covenant, he would observe his fidelity to her. On the morrow, which was the fifth of the nones of March [March 3], a splendid procession being formed, she was received in the cathedral of Winchester; the bishop-legate conducting her on the right side, and Bernard bishop of St. David's on the left. There were present also, Alexander bishop of Lincoln, Robert of Hereford, Nigel of Ely, Robert of Bath: the abbots, Ingulf of Abingdon, Edward of Reading, Peter of Malmesbury, Gilbert of Gloucester, Roger of Tewkesbury, and some others. In a few days, Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, came to the empress at Winchester, by invitation of the legate: but he deferred swearing fealty to her, deeming it beneath his reputation and character to change sides, till he had consulted the king. In consequence, he, and many other prelates, with some few of the laity, were allowed to visit Stephen and converse with him; and, graciously obtaining leave to submit to the exigency of the times, they embraced the sentiments of the legate. The empress passed Easter, which happened on the third of the kalends of April [March 30], at Oxford; the rest returned to their respective homes.

§ 43. On the second day after the octaves of Easter [April 7], a council began, with great parade, at Winchester, consisting of Theobald archbishop of Canterbury, all the bishops of England, and many abbots; the legate presiding. Such as were absent, accounted for it by messengers and letters. As I was present at the holding of this council, I will not deny posterity a true account of its proceedings: I perfectly remember that, on the same day, after the letters were read by which some excused their absence, the legate called the bishops apart, and discoursed with them in secret of his design; then the abbots, and, lastly, the archdeacons were summoned. Of his intention nothing transpired publicly, though what was to be done engrossed the minds and conversation of all.

² Marchio. This latterly signified marquis in the sense we now use it; but in Malmesbury's time, and long after, it denoted a guardian of the borders: hence the lords marchers on the confines of Scotland and Wales; though it does not appear very clearly how this should apply to Wallingford.

§ 44. On the third day of the week [April 8], the speech of the legate ran nearly to this effect: "That, by the condescension of the pope, he acted as his vicegerent in England: wherefore, by his authority, the clergy of England were assembled at this council, to deliberate on the peace of the country, which was exposed to imminent danger: that, in the time of king Henry, his uncle, England had been the peculiar abode of peace; so that, by the activity, and spirit, and care of that most excellent man, not only the natives, of whatever power or dignity, dared make no disturbance; but, by his example, each neighbouring king and prince, also, yielded to peace, and either persuaded, or compelled, his subjects to do the like; moreover, that this king, some years before his death, had caused the whole realm of England, as well as the duchy of Normandy, to be engaged, by the oaths of all the bishops and barons, to his daughter, late the empress, (who was his only surviving issue by his former consort,) if he should fail of male offspring by the wife he had espoused from Lorrain: and adverse fortune," said he, "was envious of my most excellent uncle, and suffered him to die in Normandy without male issue. Therefore, as it seemed long to wait for a sovereign who delayed coming to England, (for she resided in Normandy,) we provided for the peace of the country, and my brother was allowed to reign. And although I gave myself as surety between him and God, that he would honour and advance the holy church, and uphold good, but abrogate evil laws; yet it grieves me to remember, it shames me to say, how he conducted himself in the kingdom; how justice ceased to be exerted against the daring; how all peace was annihilated, almost within the year: the bishops made captive, and compelled to give up their possessions; the abbey sold; the churches robbed of their treasures; the counsels of the abandoned regarded, while those of the virtuous were postponed, or totally despised. You know how often I addressed him, both by myself, and the bishops, more especially in the council held last year for that purpose, and that I gained by it nothing but odium. Every one who shall think rightly must be aware, that I ought to love my mortal brother, but that I should still more regard the cause of my immortal Father. Wherefore, since God has exercised his judgment on my brother, by permitting him, without my knowledge, to fall into the hands of the powerful, I have invited you all here to assemble by virtue of my legation, lest the kingdom should fall to decay through want of a sovereign. The case was yesterday agitated in private, before the major part of the English clergy, to whose right it principally pertains to elect the sovereign, and also to crown him. First, then, as is fitting, invoking God's assistance, we elect the daughter of that peaceful, that glorious, that rich, that good, that, in our times, incomparable king, as sovereign of England and Normandy, and promise her fidelity and support."

sentiments, or by their silence assented thereto, he added: "We have despatched messengers for the Londoners, (who, from the importance of their city in England, are nobles, as it were,) to meet us on this business: and have sent them a safe-conduct: and I trust they will not delay their arrival beyond to-morrow: wherefore let us give them indulgence till that time."

§ 46. On the fourth day of the week [April 9], the Londoners came; and being introduced to the council, urged their cause, so far as to say, that, they were sent from the fraternity, as they call it, of London, not to contend, but to entreat that their lord the king might be liberated from captivity; that all the barons who had long since been admitted to their fellowship, most earnestly solicited this of the lord legate and the archbishop, as well as of all the clergy who were present. The legate answered them copiously and eloquently: and, that their request might be the less complied with, the speech of the preceding day was repeated, with the addition, that it did not become the Londoners, who were considered, as the chief people of England, in the light of nobles, to side with those persons who had deserted their lord in battle; by whose advice, the king had dishonoured the holy church; and who, in fact, only appeared to favour the Londoners, that they might drain them of their money.

§ 47. In the meantime, a certain person, whose name, if I rightly remember, was Christian, a clerk belonging to the queen, as I heard, rose up, and held forth a paper to the legate. He, having silently perused it, exalted his voice to the highest pitch, and said, that it was informal, and improper to be recited in so great an assembly, especially of dignified and religious persons. For, among other offensive and singular points, the signature of a person was affixed to it, who, in the preceding year, at a similar council, had attacked the venerable bishops with opprobrious language. The legate thus baffling him, the clerk was not wanting to his mission, but, with notable confidence, read the letter in their hearing; of which this was the purport:—"The queen earnestly entreated the whole clergy assembled, and especially the bishop of Winchester, the brother of her lord, to restore the said lord to his kingdom, whom abandoned persons, and even such as were under homage to him, had cast into chains." To this suggestion, the legate answered to the same effect as to the Londoners. These conferring together, declared, that they would relate the decree of the council to their townsmen, and give it their support, as far as they were able. On the fifth day of the week the council broke up, many of the royal party having been first excommunicated; more especially William Martel, who had formerly been cup-bearer to king Henry, and was at that time butler to Stephen; for he had sorely exasperated the legate, by intercepting and pilfering much of his property.

§ 48. It was now a work of great difficulty to soothe the minds of the Londoners; for, though these matters, as I have said, were agitated immediately after Easter, yet was it only a few days before the Nativity of St. John [June 24] that they would receive the impress. At that time, great part of England readily submitted to her government; her brother Robert was assiduously employed in promoting her dignity by every becoming method; kindly addressing the nobility, making many promises, and intimidating the adverse party, or even, by messengers, exhorting them to peace; and, already, restoring justice and the law of the land, and tranquillity, throughout every district which favoured the empress: and it is sufficiently notorious, that if his party had trusted to Robert's moderation and wisdom, it would not afterwards have experienced so melancholy a reverse. The lord legate, too, appeared of laudable fidelity, in furthering the interests of the empress. But, behold! at the very moment when she imagined she should get immediate possession of all England, everything was changed. The Londoners, ever suspicious and murmuring among themselves, now burst out into open expressions of hatred; and, as it is reported, even laid wait for their sovereign and her nobles. Aware of, and escaping, this plot, they gradually retired from the city, without tumult, and in a certain military order. The empress was accompanied by the legate, and David king of Scotland, the heroine's uncle, together with her brother Robert, who then, as at every other time, shared her fortune; and, in short, all her partisans, to a man, escaped in safety. The Londoners learning their departure, flew to their residence, and plundered everything which they had left in their haste.

§ 49. Not many days after, a misunderstanding arose between the legate and the empress, which may be justly considered as the melancholy cause of every subsequent evil in England. How this happened, I will explain. King Stephen had a son named Eustace, begotten on the daughter of Eustace earl of Boulogne. For king Henry, the father of the empress, (that I may go back somewhat, to acquaint posterity with the truth of these transactions,) had given Mary, the sister of his wife, the mother of this lady, in marriage to the aforesaid earl, as he was of noble descent, and equally renowned for prudence and for valour. By Mary, Eustace had no issue except a daughter, called Matilda. When she became marriageable, after the death of her father, the same truly magnificent king gave her in wedlock to his nephew Stephen, and also procured, by his care, the county of Boulogne for him, as he had before conferred on him that of Moritot in Normandy. The legate had justly proposed that these counties should be bestowed on his nephew Eustace, whom I mentioned, so long as his father should remain in captivity. This the empress altogether opposed, and it is doubtful whether she had not even promised them to others. Offended at the repulse, he kept from her court many days; and though repeatedly sent for, persisted in refusing to go thither. In the meanwhile, he held a friendly conference with the queen, his brother's wife, at Guildford, and being wrought upon by her tears and concessions, bent his mind to the liberation of Stephen: he also absolved, without consulting the bishops, all those of the king's party whom he had excommunicated in the council. His complaints against the empress were disseminated through England: that she wished to seize his person; that she observed nothing which she had sworn to him; that all the barons of England had performed their engagements towards her, but that she had violated hers, as she knew not how to use her prosperity with moderation.

§ 50. To allay, if possible, these commotions, the earl of Gloucester, with a small retinue, proceeded to Winchester; but failing in his endeavours, he returned to Oxford, where his sister had for some time established her residence. She, therefore, understanding, as well from what she was continually hearing, as from what she then learnt from her brother, that the legate had no friendly dispositions towards her, proceeded to Winchester with such forces as she could muster. Being immediately admitted into the royal castle, she sent messengers to the bishop, probably with good intentions, requesting that, as she was upon the spot, he would come to her without delay. He, not thinking it safe to go, deceived the messengers by an evasive answer; merely saying, "I will prepare myself:" and immediately he sent for all such as he knew were well-disposed to the king. In consequence, almost all the earls of England came; for they were full of youth and levity, and preferred military enterprise to peace. Besides, many of them were ashamed at having deserted the king in battle, as has been said before; and thought to wipe off the ignominy of having fled, by attending this meeting. Few, however, attended the empress: there were, David king of Scotland, Robert earl of Gloucester, Milo of Hereford, and some barons: for Ranulph earl of Chester came late, and to no purpose. To comprise, therefore, a long series of events within narrow limits: the roads on every side of Winchester were watched by the queen and the earls who had come with her, lest supplies should be brought in to those who had sworn fidelity to the empress. The town of Andover, also, was burnt. On the west, therefore, necessaries were procured but scantily, and with difficulty; some persons found on the road being intercepted, and either killed or maimed: while on the east, every avenue towards London was crowded with supplies destined for the bishop and his party; Geoffrey¹ de Mandeville, who had now again revolted to them, (for formerly, after the capture of the king, he had sworn fidelity to the empress,) and the Londoners, lending every possible assistance, and omitting no circumstance which might distress the empress. The people of Winchester were, though secretly, inclined to her side; regarding the faith they had before pledged to her, although they had been, in some degree, compelled by the bishop to such a measure. In the meanwhile combustibles were hurled from the bishop's castle on the houses of the townspeople, (who, as I have said, rather wished success to the empress than the bishop,) which caught and burnt the whole abbey of nuns, within the city, and the monastery, which is called Hide, without the walls. Here was an image of our crucified Lord, wrought with a profusion of gold and silver and precious stones, through the pious solicitude of Cnut, who was formerly king, and presented it. This being seized by the flames and thrown to the ground, was afterwards stripped of its ornaments at the command of the legate himself: more than five hundred marks of silver, and thirty of gold, which were found on it, served for a largess to the soldiers. The abbey of nuns at Warewell was also burnt by one William de Ipres, an abandoned character, who feared neither God nor man, because some of the partisans of the empress had secured themselves within it.

§ 51. In the meantime, the earl of Gloucester, though suffering, with his followers, by daily contests with the royalists, and though circumstances turned out far beneath his expectation, yet ever abstained from the burning of churches, notwithstanding he resided in the vicinity of St. Swithun's. But unable to endure any longer the disgrace of being, together with his party, almost besieged, and seeing fortune inclining towards the enemy, he deemed it expedient to yield to necessity; and, having marshalled his troops, he prepared to depart. Sending his sister, therefore, and the rest in the vanguard, that she might proceed without interruption, he himself retreated gently, with a chosen few, who had spirit enough not to be alarmed at a multitude. The earls immediately pursued him, and as he thought it disgraceful and beneath his dignity to fly, and was the chief object of universal attack, he was made captive. The rest, especially the chiefs, proceeded on their destined journey, and, with the utmost precipitation, reached Devizes. Thus they departed from Winchester on the day of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross [Sept. 14], which at that time happened on a Sunday, having come thither a few days before the Assumption of the holy mother of God [Aug. 15]. It appeared to some rather miraculous, and was matter of general conversation in England, that the king on the Sunday of the Purification of our Lady [Feb. 2], and the earl on the Sunday of the Exaltation of the life-impacting Cross, should each experience a similar fate. This, however, was truly worthy of remark and admiration, that no one, on this mischance, ever beheld the earl of Gloucester either dispirited or dejected in countenance; for he breathed too high a consciousness of dignity, to subject himself to the caprice of fortune; and although he was at first invited by soothing measures, and afterwards assailed by threats, he never consented to treat of his liberation, except with the privity of his sister. At last the affair was thus decided: that the king and himself should be liberated on equal terms; no condition being proposed, except that each might defend his party, to the utmost of his abilities, as before. These matters, after repeated and long discussion, from the Exaltation of the Holy Cross to the festival of All Saints [Sept. 14—Nov. 1], then came to a suitable conclusion; and on the latter day, the king was released. On the same day he left his queen, and son, and two of the nobility, at Bristol, as sureties for the liberation of the earl; and came with the utmost speed to Winchester, where the earl, now brought from Rochester, whither he had first been taken, was at this time confined. The third day after, when the king came to Winchester, the earl departed, leaving there on that day his son William, as a pledge, till the queen should be released. Performing with quick despatch the journey to Bristol, he liberated the queen, on whose return, William, the earl's son, was set free. It is, moreover, sufficiently notorious, that although during the whole of his captivity and of the following months till Christmas, he was enticed, by numberless and magnificent promises, to revolt from his sister, yet he always deemed his fraternal affection of greater importance than any promise which could be made him : for leaving his property and his castles, which he might have quietly enjoyed, he continued unceasingly near the empress at Oxford, where, as I have said before, she fixed her residence and held her court.

§ 52. In the meantime, the legate, a prelate of unbounded spirit, who was never inclined to leave incomplete what he had once purposed, summoned by his legatine authority a council at Westminster, on the octaves of St. Andrew [Dec. 7]. I cannot relate the transactions of this council with that certainty with which I did those of the former, as I was not present. We have heard, that a letter was then read from the sovereign pope, in which he gently rebuked the legate for not endeavouring to release his brother ; but that he forgave him his former transgression, and earnestly exhorted him to attempt his liberation by any mode, whether ecclesiastical or secular : that the king himself entered the council, and complained to the reverend assembly, that his own subjects had both made captive, and nearly killed him by the indignities they inflicted on him, who had never refused them justice. That the legate himself, too, with great eloquence, endeavoured to extenuate the odium of his own conduct ; saying, that, in truth, he had received the empress, not from inclination, but necessity ; for that while his brother's overthrow was yet recent, (all the earls being either dispersed or waiting the issue of events in suspense,) she had surrounded Winchester with her party ; that she had obstinately persevered in breaking every promise she had made pertaining to the right of the churches ; and that he had it from unquestionable authority, that she and her partisans had not only had designs on his dignity, but even on his life ; that, however, God in his mercy had caused matters to fall out contrary to her hopes, so that he himself had escaped destruction, and rescued his brother from captivity ; that he commanded, therefore, on the part of God and of the pope, that they should strenuously assist the king, who had been anointed by the will of the people, and with the approbation of the holy see : but that such as disturbed the peace, in favour of the countess of Anjou, should be excommunicated, with the exception of herself, who was sovereign of the Angevins.

§ 53. I do not say, that this speech was kindly received by all the clergy, though certainly no one opposed it ; for all the clergy bridled their tongues, either through fear or through reverence. There was one layman sent from the empress, who openly forbade the legate, by the faith which he had pledged to her, to ordain anything, in that council, repugnant to her honour ; and said, that he had made oath to the empress not to assist his brother, unless, perchance, by sending him twenty horsemen at the utmost ; that her coming to England had been effected by his frequent letters ; that her taking the king, and holding him in captivity, had been done principally by his connivance. The advocate affirmed these and many other circumstances, with great harshness of language, and by no means sparing the legate. However, he could not be prevailed upon, by any force of argument, to lay aside his animosity; for, as I have said before, he was an active perseverer in what he had once taken in hand. This year, therefore, (the misfortunes of which I have briefly related,) was fatal, and nearly destructive to England; during which, though conceiving that she might now, perhaps, experience some little respite, yet she became again involved in calamity, and, unless God's mercy shall shortly come to her relief, must there long continue.

§ 54. It seems fitting that I should commence the transactions of this year, which is the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and forty-three, with certain events which were unnoticed in the former; and, at the same time, briefly recapitulate what has been said, in various places, of Robert earl of Gloucester, son of king Henry, and submit it, thus arranged, to the consideration of the reader. For, as he was the first to espouse the just defence of his sister, so did he persevere with unshaken constancy in her cause, without remuneration; I say, without remuneration, because some of her supporters, either, following the course of fortune, are changed with its revolutions, or, having already obtained considerable benefits, fight for justice under expectation of still further recompence: Robert alone, or nearly alone, uninfluenced by such considerations, was never swayed, as will appear hereafter, either by hope of advantage or fear of loss. Let no one, therefore, suspect me of adulation, if I relate these matters circumstantially; for I shall make no sacrifice to favour; but pure historical truth, without any stain of falsehood, shall be handed down for the information of posterity.

§ 55. It has been related of the earl, how, first¹ of all the nobility, after David king of Scotland, he confirmed by oath his fealty to his sister, the empress, for the kingdom of England and the duchy of Normandy, in the presence of his father Henry: there having been some contention, as I have said, between him and Stephen earl of Boulogne, afterwards king of England, who should swear first; Robert alleging the preference of a son, Stephen the dignity of a nephew.

§ 56. It has been recorded, too, what reasonable causes, from December, when his father died, till after the ensuing Easter, detained him, in Normandy, from coming immediately into England to avenge his sister's injuries: and when at last he did come, with what just deliberation, and with what proviso, he consented to do homage to the king; and how justly, in the following year and thenceforward, he abjured it.

§ 57. Nor has his second arrival in England from Normandy, after his father's death, with his sister, been omitted; where, relying on the favour of God and his innate courage, he ventured himself, as into a desert full of wild beasts, though scarcely accompanied by one hundred and forty horsemen. Neither has it been unnoticed, that, amid such tumult of war, while anxious watch was kept on all sides, he boldly came to Bristol with only twelve horsemen, having committed his sister to safe custody, as he supposed, at Arundel; nor with what prudence, at that time, he received her from the very midst of her enemies, and afterwards advanced her in all things to the utmost of his power; ever busied on her account, and neglecting his own interest to secure hers, while some persons, taking advantage of his absence, plundered his possessions on every side; and, lastly, urged by what necessity, namely, to rescue his son-in-law, whom the king had besieged, he engaged in a hazardous conflict, and took the king prisoner. This fortunate event, however, was somewhat obscured by his own capture at Winchester, as I have recorded in the transactions of the former year; though, by the grace of God, he showed himself, not so much an object of commiseration, as of praise, in that capture. For, when he saw that the royalist earls were so persevering in the pursuit that the business could not be gotten through without loss on his part, he sent forward all those for whom he was under apprehension, and more especially the empress. When they had proceeded far enough to escape in safety, he followed leisurely, that the retreat might not resemble a flight, and received the attack of the pursuers himself; thus purchasing, by his own detention, the liberty of his friends. And now even at the moment of his capture, no one, as I have said above, perceived him either dispirited, or humbled in language; he seemed so far to tower above fortune, that he compelled his persecutors, for I am loth to call them enemies, to respect him. Wherefore the queen, though she might have remembered that her husband had been fettered by his command, yet never suffered fetters of any kind to be put upon him, nor presumed on her dignity to treat him dishonourably. And finally, at Rochester, for thither he was conducted, he went freely whither he pleased to the churches below the castle, and conversed with whom he chose, the queen only being present: after her departure he was held in free custody in the keep, and such forethought and sense of security had he, that, getting money from his vassals in Kent, he bought some valuable horses, which were both serviceable and beneficial to him afterwards.

§ 58. The earls, and those whose business it was to speak of such matters, at first, tried if he would allow of the king and himself being liberated on equal terms. Though his countess, Mabil, out of solicitude for her beloved husband, would have embraced these terms the moment she heard them, being, through conjugal affection, bent on his liberation, yet he, in his wiser policy, refused; asserting that a king and an earl were not of equal importance; however, if they would allow all who had been taken with him, or for him, to be set at liberty, to this he might consent. But the earls and other royalists would not assent to these terms; they were anxious, indeed, for the king's liberty, but not at their own pecuniary loss; for earl Gilbert had taken William of Salisbury; and William de Ipres had taken Humphry de Bohun; and others had made such captures as they could, at Winchester, greedily expecting large sums for their ransom.

voured to seduce him with magnificent promises. Would he go over to the king's side, and dismiss his sister, he should govern the whole country; all things should await his decision; the crown should be the only distinction between him and the king; over all others he should rule as he pleased. The earl rejected these unbounded promises, with a memorable reply, which I wish posterity to hear and to admire. "I am not my own master," said he, "but am in another's power; when I shall see myself at my own disposal, I promise to do everything which reason dictates on the matter you propound."

§ 60. Irritated and incensed at this, when they could do nothing by fair means, they began to threaten that they would send him over sea to Boulogne, and keep him in perpetual bondage till death. Still, however, with a serene countenance, dispelling their threats, he firmly and truly protested that he feared nothing less: for he relied on the spirit of the countess, his wife, and the courage of his partisans, who would immediately send the king into Ireland, if they heard of any foul deed perpetrated against himself.

§ 61. A month elapsed in these transactions; so difficult a work was it to effect the liberation of princes whom fortune had fettered with her chain. But, at length, the supporters of the empress having conferred together, entreated the earl by frequent messages, that as he could not do what he would, according to the comic writer, he would do what he could; that he should allow, therefore, the king and himself to be set at liberty on equal terms. "Otherwise," said they, "we fear lest the earls, inspired by the consciousness of their great and most distinguished exploit in making you captive, should attack us one by one, reduce our castles, and even make an attempt upon your sister."

§ 62. Robert, wrought upon at length, assented to the proposal of the legate and archbishop, but still on condition that none of the castles, or territories, should be restored, which had come under the power of the empress, or of any of her adherents, since the capture of the king; but he could not by any means obtain the release of his friends, as he had given offence to some persons in rejecting, with a kind of superciliousness, their magnificent promises with respect to the government of the whole kingdom. And as they were extremely anxious that, for the royal dignity, the king should be first set at liberty, and then the earl; when he demurred to this, the legate and the archbishop made oath, that if the king, after his own liberation, refused to release the earl, they would forthwith deliver themselves up into Robert's power, to be conducted wherever he pleased.

§ 63. Nor did he rest here; for his sagacious mind discovered an additional security. It might fall out, that the king, as often happens, listening to evil counsel, would consider the detention of his brother and of the archbishop as of very little consequence, so that he himself were at his ease. He demanded, therefore, from them both, separately, instruments, with their seals, addressed to the pope, to the following effect: "That the sovereign pope was to understand, that they, for the liberation of the king and the peace of the kingdom, had bound themselves to the earl by this covenant, that, if the king refused to liberate him after his own release, they themselves would willingly surrender to his custody. Should it, therefore, come to this calamitous issue, they earnestly entreated, (what it would well become the papal goodness voluntarily to perform,) that he would release them, who were his suffragans, as well as the earl, from unjustifiable durance." There was something more to the same effect.

§ 64. These writings, received from both prelates, Robert deposited in a place of safety, and came to Winchester with them and a great company of the barons. The king also, as has been before observed, coming thither soon after, had a friendly interview with the earl. But although he, and all the earls present, eagerly busied themselves in bringing over Robert to their wishes, yet, "firm as a rock amid the ocean in his resistance," he rendered their attempts abortive, or refuted them by argument. He affirmed, that it was neither reasonable nor natural, that he should desert his sister, whose cause he had justly espoused, not for any benefit to himself, nor so much out of dislike to the king, as regard to his oath, which, they also ought to remember, it was impiety to violate; especially when he called to mind, that he had been enjoined by the pope to respect the oath he had taken to his sister in the presence of his father. Thus failing of peace, they severally departed.

§ 65. The reason why I have not incorporated these events with the transactions of the former year, is, that I did not then know them; for I have always dreaded to transmit anything to posterity, through my narrative, the truth of which I could not perfectly vouch for. What, then, I have to relate of the present year, will commence as follows:

§ 66. The respective parties of the empress and of the king conducted themselves with quiet forbearance from Christmas to Lent [March 4], anxious rather to preserve their own, than to ravage the possessions of others. The king went to a distant part of the kingdom, for the purpose of quelling some disturbances. Lent coming on, gave all a respite from war; in the midst of which, the empress came with her party to Devizes, where her secret designs were debated. So much of them however transpired, that it was known that all her partisans had agreed to send for the earl of Anjou, who was most interested in the defence of the inheritance of his wife and children in England. Men of respectability were, therefore, despatched, and such as might fitly execute a business of such magnitude.

§ 67. Not long after, in the Easter holidays, the king, while meditating, as it is said, some harsh measures, was detained by an acute disease at Northampton; so severe, indeed, that he was reported, almost throughout England, as being at the point of death.

§ 68. In the meantime, the messengers returning from Anjou, related the result of their mission to the empress and the princes in a second council, held at Devizes on the octaves of Pentecost [June 14]. They said, that the earl of Anjou, in some measure, favoured the mission of the nobility; but that among them all, he was only well acquainted with the earl of Gloucester, of whose prudence and fidelity, greatness of mind and industry, he had long since had proof. Were he to make a voyage to him, he would, as far as he was able, accede to his wishes; but that all other persons would expend their labour in passing and re-passing to no purpose.

§ 69. The hopes of all the assembly being thus excited, they entreated that the earl would condescend to undertake this task, on account of the inheritance of his sister and nephews. At first he excused himself, alleging the difficulty of the business; the perilous journey, beset with enemies, on either side of the sea; that it would be attended with danger to his sister; as, in his absence, those persons would be hardly able to defend her, who, distrusting even the strength of their own party, had nearly deserted her during his captivity. Yielding at length to the general desire, he demanded hostages, especially from those who were considered as the chief persons, to be taken with him into Normandy, and to be pledges, as well to the earl of Anjou, as to the empress; and that all, continuing at Oxford, should unite in defending her from injury to the utmost while he was absent. His propositions were eagerly approved, and hostages given him to be conducted into Normandy.

§ 70. Robert, therefore, bidding adieu to his sister, and taking with him his hostages and some light troops, proceeded by safe marches to Wareham, which town and castle he had, long since, entrusted to his eldest son, William. There, soon after the festival of St. John [June 24], committing himself, by the grace of God, to the ocean, with such vessels as he then possessed, he weighed anchor. When they were about mid-sea, a tempest arose, and all, except two, were dispersed; some were driven back, and some carried beyond their destination: two only, in one of which was the earl with his most faithful adherents, keeping their course, arrived in the wished for port. Proceeding thus to Caen, he sent messengers for the earl of Anjou. The earl came without reluctance, but stated his difficulties, and those not a few, to the object of the embassy, when proposed to him; among others, that he should be detained from coming into England by the rebellion of many castles in Normandy. This circumstance delayed the earl of Gloucester's return longer than he had intended: for, that he might deprive the earl of Anjou of every excuse, he assisted him in subduing ten castles in Normandy, the¹ names of which were, Tenerchebrei, Seithilaret, Brichesart, Alani, Bastonborg, Triveres, Castel de Vira, Plaseiz, Vilers, Moretoin. Yet, even by this activity, he furthered the end of his mission but little. The earl of Anjou stated fresh causes, as the former were done away, to excuse his coming into England. Indeed, as a very singular favour, he permitted his eldest son, by the empress, to accompany his uncle to England, by whose presence the chiefs might be encouraged to defend the cause of the lawful heir. The youth is named Henry, after his grandfather; may he hereafter resemble him in happiness and in power.

§ 71. In England, in the meantime, the king, seizing the opportunity of the earl's absence, came unexpectedly to Wareham, and finding it slightly garrisoned, he burnt and plundered the town, and immediately got possession of the castle also. Not content with this (as he saw fortune inclined to favour him), three days before the festival of St. Michael, by an unexpected¹ chance, he burnt the city of Oxford, and laid siege to the castle, in which was the empress with her household troops. This he did with such determined resolution, that he declared no hope of advantage or fear of loss should induce him to depart, till the castle was delivered up, and the empress surrendered to his power. Shortly after, all the nobility of the empress's party, ashamed at being absent from their sovereign in violation of their compact, assembled in large bodies at Wallingford, with the determination of attacking the king, if he would risk a battle in the open plain; but they had no intention of assailing him within the city, as the earl of Gloucester had so fortified it with ditches that it appeared impregnable, unless by fire.

§ 72. These rumours becoming prevalent in Normandy, Robert earl of Gloucester hastened his return. He embarked, therefore, somewhat more than three hundred horsemen on board fifty-two vessels; to these were added two which he took at sea on his return. God's grace so singularly favoured his pious resolution, that not one ship out of so great a number was separated, but all nearly close together, or gently proceeding one before the other, ploughed the calm bosom of the deep. Nor did the waves violently dash against the fleet, but rather seemed subserviently to further their passage; like that most beautiful appearance of the sea, when the wave, gradually approaching, gently breaks upon the shore. Thus making the port of Wareham, these favoured vessels restored the earl and all his companions to the wishes of their friends.

§ 73. He had, at first, thought of landing at Southampton, at once to wreak his vengeance, both on its inhabitants and on their lord; but this resolution was changed through the repeated entreaties of the Vituli, who were fearful that their dearest connexions, who resided at Southampton, would be involved in the general calamity. These are a kind of mariners, who are known by the name of

Vituli; and as they are his faithful adherents, he thought fit to listen to their petitions, and desist from his design. Again, it appeared more dignified to return to the place whence he had departed, and to recover by force what he had lost by a similar mode. Reducing, therefore, immediately the port and town, he laid siege to the castle; which by its strength stimulated the spirit, not to call it obstinacy, of the king's choicest troops who defended it. Yet, nevertheless, soon after, the garrison, shaken in their resolution by the engines of the earl, and greatly alarmed, begged a truce, that, as is the custom of the military, they might demand assistance from the king; consenting to deliver up the castle, if he refused to come by a certain day. This, though he was possessed with the utmost impatience to become master of the fortress, was very agreeable to the earl, as it led him to suppose it might draw off Stephen from besieging his sister. We may imagine what firmness of mind this man possessed, who, with little more than three hundred horsemen, and, as yet, joined by no succours in England, could undauntedly await the king, who was reported to have more than a thousand; for many persons had joined the siege, not so much through dislike to the empress, as through the hope of plunder.

§ 74. However, when it was certified that the king refused assistance to the besieged at Wareham, the earl, pertinaciously keeping up the attack, got possession of the castle, and with the same celerity subdued the island of Portland, which they had fortified, as well as a third castle, called Lulleworth, which belonged to a certain chamberlain, called William of Glastonbury, who had lately revolted from the empress. Robert, then, at the beginning of Advent [Nov. 29], summoned the whole of Matilda's partisans to Cirencester: where, all resolving to afford their sovereign every possible assistance, they meditated a march to Oxford, courageously determining to give the king battle, unless he retreated. But as they were on their route, the pleasing account reached them, that the empress had escaped from the blockaded castle at Oxford, and was now at Wallingford in security. Turning aside thither, then, at the suggestion of their sovereign, (since the soldiers who had remained at her departure, after delivering up the castle, had gone away without molestation, and the holidays admonished them to repose awhile,) they resolved to abstain from battle, and retired to their homes.

HERE ENDS THE THIRD BOOK OF MALMESBURY'S HISTORY OF HIS OWN TIMES.

§ 75. I would very willingly subjoin the manner of the empress's liberation, did I know it to a certainty; for it is undoubtedly one of God's manifest miracles. This, however, is sufficiently notorious, that, through fear of the earl's approach, many of the besiegers at Oxford stole away, wherever they were able, and the rest remitted their vigilance, and kept not so good a look-out as before ; more anxious for their own safety, in case it came to a battle, than bent on the destruction of others.¹
